PREFACE.

IN ancient times Polemon wrote an account of the votive offerings on the Acropolis of Athens in four books\(^1\), and another of those in Lacedaemon\(^2\); Menetor wrote also a book on votive offerings\(^3\). Since their day the subject has met with scant attention; there is no general work dealing with it, and I know only of Tomasino’s book\(^4\) on Roman votive offerings, the pamphlets of Reisch and Ziemann\(^5\), and the articles in the Dictionaries of Smith, of Daremberg and Saglio, and in Pauly’s Realencyclopaedie (Donarium, Donaria). A number of essays have, however, appeared on special parts of the subject, particularly in the archaeological journals, which will be found cited in the notes to this book. Most of them have their value, but it consists chiefly in their collection and presentation of facts. I have not wittingly used the work of others without acknowledgment; but inasmuch as most of my collections were made before I met with the books and articles alluded to, I have not thought it necessary to refer to these for quotations which we have found independently. I must particularly mention, however, Mr J. G. Frazer’s Pausanias, which has been of great help in revising my book.

In the present essay I have attempted first to set forth the facts in some convenient order, then to deduce principles from them: the only possible plan in dealing with a subject which has never been fully investigated, and where explanations are commonly assumed as axioms without an attempt at proof. I began my work with a few of these ready-made theories, which so impressively enunciated seemed to be no more open to suspicion than Caesar's wife; to my surprise, as the evidence displayed itself, I saw them drop away one by one, and since the conclusions I have been led to are very different from what I expected, I may fairly claim that they are due to no prejudice. If those who prefer the old assumptions can give reasons for their faith, I am willing to learn; the true test of my own suggestions will be, whether future discoveries will fall readily into their proper place. It has interested me greatly to see that this subject, in itself apparently of small account, yet throws light on more than one great principle; and after the ten years' work which has gone to make this book, I seem to see far more clearly than I did the sincerity and simplicity of Greek religion in the great age, and the elements of corruption which finally brought it to nought. In this history there are not wanting apt illustrations of modern tendencies, which have more than antiquarian interest.

I tried to make my collection of facts complete; but so large was the mass of them that they could not all be presented. Certain classes of dedications, such as those of honorific statues, could without loss be dealt with summarily; and, in general, there is little to interest in dedications which are later than the fourth century. Before that date I have not wittingly omitted anything of note or significance. The most arduous part of the task has been to sift the archaeological finds. If in the hundreds of journals and periodicals much has been overlooked, the only excuse I can offer is that the book was written at Tomi, where there are no libraries, and therefore the time available for the search has been a week stolen here and there from leisure. It should also be remembered, that with a few exceptions (such as the Asclepius and hero reliefs) even the pioneer work of collection and comparison had not been done. When we have a Corpus of Reliefs, and more exact descriptions of the figures of all sorts which have been discovered in sanctuaries, it is quite possible that many obscurities may be cleared up, and mistakes corrected. This being so, it may seem rash to have published this book so soon; but after all, one might have waited until the Greek Kalends. It is something to have the available facts collected, which I have tried to do: if the future should bring more light for them, I shall be the first to welcome it. The only criticism which I shall not welcome is a vain repetition of old shibboleths, some at least of which I think this volume ought to destroy.

Although it was no part of my purpose to record foreign parallels, I have done so wherever I happened to know of anything to the point. It was, however, all along my intention to include modern survivals; and therefore I have described at some length the practices which now hold in the Levant. I speak chiefly from my own knowledge of these; but where other travellers have recorded similar scenes, I have generally added a reference to their works.

In the inscriptions which are cited below, restored letters are printed in thick type; and the iota adscript is printed in line, not beneath, where it is found on the stone. Where it is printed subscript I have copied my authority; in such cases there was no exact transcription available.

Proper names have been spelt in the traditional way; but Greek epithets, and some names not familiar in Latin form, keep the Greek spelling. In this matter it seems better to be inconsistent than pedantic, and nothing is gained by dubbing an old acquaintance Aischulos or Thoukudides.

I am well aware of the faults of this essay; but those who have not attempted to deal with the subject will not readily believe, how difficult it has been to present the material in anything like a clear arrangement. For one thing, there is its bulk; for another, its incompleteness. It was necessary to choose between two alternatives: either to adopt one uniform classification, and in each section to fill in such heads as were there represented; or to classify the matter in each chapter in the way most convenient, and to leave the general scheme to develop itself in the final survey. The former plan would have left in several chapters ugly gaps, and would have made it difficult to find a place for a great deal of my material; I therefore chose the latter. It is a drawback, no doubt, that the arrangement thus differs in the different chapters, some of which deal with specified groups of divinities and others with specified occasions: but in my opinion the gain is great, in that the theories of explanation are not assumed, but evolve themselves.

I have to thank the administrators of the Worts Fund for a grant of £50, which in the year 1896 enabled me to visit the museums of Sparta, Smyrna, Samos, Odessa, and Petersburg. Dr Waldstein and Dr de Cou, with the true scholar’s generosity, have allowed me to quote from their unpublished discoveries in the Heraeum; and M. Haussoullier also was so good as to send me a copy of some inscriptions found by him at Branchidae. My thanks are due also to Prof. E. Gardner and Prof. Rhys Roberts, who did me the service of reading and criticising the proofs; to the Council of the Anthropological Institute, who kindly allowed me to use two plates from Major Temple’s article referred to below (p. 391'); and to Prof. Ridgeway for the loan of several blocks from his Early Age of Greece.

GREEK VOTIVE OFFERINGS.

INTRODUCTION.

PLAN OF THE BOOK.

Whatever is given of freewill to a being conceived as superhuman is to speak strictly a votive offering. The motive is simple, but not always the same: the occasion is accidental, or, if it be determined, the gift is not compulsory. This definition excludes all taxes, whether paid to a god or a government, and includes the sacrifice of animals at the altar. But some taxes or customary contributions are so closely associated with votive offerings, or so clearly grow out of them, that no strict line can be drawn; and to discuss the principle of the sacrifice would lead us far afield into questions of comparative custom, whilst the details of sacrifice are not instructive for our present purpose. Sacrifice will therefore be only touched on by the way, and a few pages will be given to the consideration of ritual fines. On the other hand, tithes and firstfruits paid in kind are important to us, both in themselves and for their developments, and something must be said of them. The main purpose of the book, however, is to collect and classify those offerings which are not immediately perishable; and by examining the occasion of their dedication, and the statements made about it, to trace if possible the motives of the dedicator and the meaning which the act had for him.
We shall begin with the Worship of the Dead, which is demonstrably one of the oldest found on Greek soil, and the customs connected with it. The second chapter will deal with Tithes and Firstfruits. Next will be considered several important occasions for the dedication of votive offerings: Victory in War and the Games; deliverance from Disease, Danger, or Calamity; the crises of Domestic Life; memorials of Honour and Office; memorials of Ritual; and Propitiation of an offended deity. A brief survey will be taken of things dedicated for their rarity, and of some curious developments of the main custom. We shall then collect the formulae of dedication, and indicate how the objects were disposed of. Lastly, a general review will gather up all the threads together, and draw the necessary conclusions.
I.

THE DEAD, THE HEROES, AND THE CHTHONIAN DEITIES.

Ἐλλάδος προσελθούσις τῷ Ἀπόλλωνι καὶ ἐρωτώμενος ὤποικ ἔτι τιμᾶν τὸν Ἡρακλέα μετὰ τὴν ἀποθέωσιν, εἴπεν ὁ θεός· ηὔν μὲν ὡς ἥρωι, λύριον δὲ ὡς θεόν.

Schol. Pindar Nem. ii. 38.

Every student of primitive culture knows how common a practice it is to immolate men, women, and animals at the funeral, and to send with the dead into his new home food and drink, and the articles which by analogy with this world he might be expected to want. In case of burial, food is placed upon the mound and drink poured into the earth, whilst the tools or utensils are laid with the body in the tomb; in case of burning, the offerings may be destroyed by fire. In the Odyssey we see the underlying principles in all their bare savagery, when Ulysses cuts the throats of his victims over a ditch, and the insubstantial shades by drinking of the blood gain a momentary strength to answer his questions. On the other hand, at the funeral games of Patroclus there is immolation of victims, but its meaning is not so much as hinted at. To argue that the practice described in the Odyssey grew up after the date of the Iliad, is impossible; because in the former we have a complete parallel to the practices of savages, while the civilisation of the Iliad is too advanced to admit of such practices beginning there. The Iliad is in fact earlier in date, but later in culture, than the ninth book of the Odyssey; it is silent of many things, such as the mutilation of Cronus, which crop up first at a later date.

1 See Furtwängler, Collection Sabouroff, Introduction; Roscher, Lex. der Mythol., s.v. Heros.
And the worship of the dead is attested not only by literature but by archaeology: moreover, there is evidence of continuity. The excavation of the beehive tomb at Menidhi in Attica brought to light a series of sacrificial vases, which proved that the cult had been practised there without a break from the Mycenaean to the classical age. We are justified then in assuming that the γέρας θανώτων included more than a barrow and a stone slab; and in regarding the burial of toys and vases in the tombs of a later day as the survival of an outgrown belief.

The rites done for the dead seem to have included a funeral feast, periodically or yearly renewed, which was celebrated at the tomb. Royal and noble houses would naturally have a family tomb; and the tendency in Greece as elsewhere was to deify the founder of the race. So the Scythian kings were honoured by the immolation of wives and slaves, by the offering of firstfruits and golden cups. Those who died after the great founder of the family would naturally join him, and become as he was. Partly for fear of what harm the ghosts could do, and partly from hope of their help, the survivors were scrupulous in doing what might please them. The tomb was filled with weapons and utensils which belonged to them in this life, or which they might be likely to want in the other. All these are strictly votive offerings; they are dedicated on a special occasion, and for the purpose of propitiation, to a being conceived as superhuman. Since, however, a distinction soon grew up between burial rites and divine ritual, I do not propose to follow out the former through all its history. Nor is it important to consider here whether or no divine ritual was always derived from the ritual of the dead. As Furtwängler acutely remarks, the pouring of a libation is meaningless unless it be connected with beings who dwell in the underworld; and this at least was extended to non-chthonian deities. But at the outset the two kinds of ritual approximate. It would appear that the recurrent feast was carved on a slab of stone and set up over the grave, perhaps as a perpetual memorial of the willingness of the living to serve the dead; and the burial rites gave rise to a type of relief which was of importance in the history of art.

1 τρίτα, ἐνατα (Isaeus, ii. 37), τρικά- δες in Lexicographers, γενέσια (Herod. iv. 26). Lucian describes how garlands and myrrh were offered, wine poured into a trench, and the offerings burned (Charon 22). Compare the inser. of Ceos, IGA 395, where mention is made of wine and oil, of sacrificial vessels, of the month's mind and the year's mind. Customary sacrifice to the dead in Olynthus: Athenaeus, viii. 334 f. So in Modern Greece: at Patmos, for example, the memorial feasts and services after a death are τρυμέρα, ἐναμέρα, σαράντα, τριμήνα, ἐξαμήνα, χρόνια, δίχρονα, and τρίχρονα.

In the Greek and Russian churches, those who are named after a saint keep his day holiday; but it is perhaps fanciful to see a connexion between this tribute to a spiritual father and ancestor worship.

This is the so-called Hero Feast or Death Feast: the earliest form is best seen in a series of ancient Spartan reliefs, of which the following may be considered typical. Two figures, a male and a female, are seated upon a throne. The male figure holds in his right hand a goblet, and extends his left in a posture which is hard to interpret: it is neither a blessing nor an accepting, the hand being held vertical. The female holds a pomegranate in her right hand, and the left holds her veil. A large snake curls under the throne, the head appearing over its back. Before the pair is seen a couple of tiny figures, a man and a woman, he holding a cock and an egg or some little object, perhaps fruit or cake, she a flower and a pomegranate. In this relief the enthroned figures turn towards the right of the spectator, but in some of later date they turn to his left. Other attributes, such as the dog, also appear, and sometimes there is no female. The heroized pair are always distinguished by being larger in size than the human adorers; a natural convention, seen often in the sculptures of Egypt and Assyria. From the rough working of the lower part of these slabs they appear to have been fixed in the earth.

1 Coll. Sab. i. pl. 1; see for the whole series, AM ii. 301 ff., 459, iv. 163, 193, vii. 163. They date from the seventh or sixth century. See fig. 1.
2 Perhaps the ambiguity is due to the artist's limitations.
3 AM ii. pl. 22.
4 Philostr. Her. 296 (685) τὸ ἐλδὸς
The earlier examples have no inscriptions to guide us in the interpretation, but the later ones are inscribed with names. They may therefore be confidently regarded as sepulchral. This view is supported by several other facts. Along with the first slab an inscription was found recording that the place was sacred to Hermes\(^1\). The snake is carved on an early Spartan tombstone\(^2\), and it is well known to be associated with the chthonian powers. Its habit of lurking in holes of the earth, its mysterious movement and uncanny eye, its silence and deadly power, have caused this creature to be regarded with superstitious awe in many parts of the world. The Greeks of a later age believed that snakes issued from the dead man’s marrow; and that is not the kind of idea which is likely to have originated in a later age. Not by Greeks alone is the serpent regarded as the incarnation of wisdom; and amongst them it continued to be associated with oracular caves and shrines. Flowers, eggs, and cock were no doubt sacrifices; and we know how the cock became the traditional poor man’s offering to Asclepius. The whole scene, then, represents one scene in the ritual of the dead, the sacrifice to wit; and as living and dead are supposed to meet in the ritual banquet, so the deified ancestors, or heroes, are represented as present at the feast or as preparing to partake in it.

Out of this early cult of ancestors appears to have grown the whole system of Hero-Worship in Greece; and this is no mere inference, for a similar principle produces the same results until long after the Christian era. To heroes are applied those terms which express ideas relating to the dead: they are “the Stronger,” “the Averter,” “the Protector.” Mortal men in time become heroes and even gods, as in the case of Asclepius and the Dioscuri. Even oracles, and the practice of sleeping in

3 I am not prepared to say that the cock had also a symbolic meaning: it was a very common sacrifice. His crow is now believed to frighten away the ghostly powers of the night; the Kalikazari in Cyprus and Cos, the witches or goblins of northern Europe. But I see no proof that the early Greeks held any such view, or that they conceived of their dead as having no power in the daytime. Sacrifice was however done to the heroes at sunset (Paus. vi. 23. 3, Schol. Pind. Isth. iv. 110) or at night (viii. 14. 11); and Athenaeus says (xi. 461 b) χαλεπῶς καὶ πλήκτας τῶν ἡρωικ πολέμων, καὶ μᾶλλον νόκτιο διὰ μεθ’ ἡμέραν.
4 Compare Robertson Smith, Religion of the Semites, 255 ff. Cf. Paus. ii. 10. 1. The hero certainly partakes in Daulis: Paus. x. 4. 10, “the blood they pour through a hole into the grave, the flesh they consume on the spot.”

the precinct for the purpose of consulting them, are attested for the dead among the Nasamones1, and alluded to elsewhere2. Sometimes the descriptive titles become abstracted and personified as heroes, a point which has significance when we remember that the Pelasgians did not name their gods3. Thus we find Amyntos at Athens, the Defender4; Eumenes, the Kindly, at Chios5; Sosias, the Saviour, at Olbia6. Soter, the Saviour, was added to the name of Brasidas heroized7, and to Demetrius and Antigonus at Athens; and in later days inscriptions are common which dedicate statues to the Roman Emperors under the title of Founder and Saviour8. Such titles imply protection in general, but others are more particular. There are heroes who specialize in war, as Phylacos the Guardian at Delphi9, Teichophylax at Myrina10, and Promachos at Psophis11; Eunostos of Tanagra12 and Deloptes13 of Samos have other functions which the names make clear. Or again, the healing of disease was the special function, and this especially where the worship centred round a medicinal spring14. Such are the Hero Physician at Athens15, and Asclepius at Tricca, of whom more anon. If there is a cave of mysterious vapours, oracle and prophecy come to the front, as in the case of Amphiaraus and Trophonius. But the idea of power in general is never lost sight of, and it is ascribed to the mighty dead throughout Greek history. Brasidas and Sophocles have already been mentioned as heroized; similar honours are ascribed to Philippus of Croton16, Onesilos at Amathus17, even to such unlikely persons as Theagenes the athlete in Phocis and many other places. The Homeric heroes one and all seem to have had this honour paid to them. Ulysses was a hero in Laconia, Agenor in Argos, Protesilaus in the Chersonese, even Hector in Boeotia. The warriors who fell at Plataea were worshiped as heroes with offerings of garments, firstfruits, and all that was customary year by year; the Spartans built a shrine to Maron and Alpheus who fell at Thermopylae; and until late days a public vote might make heroes of the gallant dead. Epicteta of Thera, in her well-known will, took upon herself this state function. She left her property to endow a shrine to the Muses and the Heroes, the last being herself and Phoenix her husband, with their two sons. In their honour recurrent feasts were to be kept up, with sacrifice and libation, when the statues of the heroes were to be adorned with garlands. In course of time the idea lost all its meaning, and hero, like the German selig, came to be a synonym for the dead.

The heroes do more than protect mankind; they also punish them for wrongdoing, or at least for an offence against themselves. In early times, of course, the line is not drawn distinctly between a ritual and a moral offence; but Philostratus tells us that in his day they were the guardians of morals to some extent. It is perhaps not rash to identify them with the mysterious daemons of Homer, who visit the habitations of men, marking their uprightness or evildoing.

Traces are found of human sacrifice offered to heroes, not only in such celebrations as the funeral games of Patroclus, but in the story of Sperthias and Bulis, and in the victims sacrificed to Seccadasus and his daughters before the battle of Leuctra. But in the times we have to do with, the usual sacrifices were firstfruits in kind, and various animals: cattle, sheep, pigs, and goats, even horses, and sometimes fish. In their honour the Arcadians celebrated regular feasts with their slaves in archaic fashion down to historical times. The heroes were brought into connexion with every meal by the libations which were poured to them in general and in particular, and by the custom, that any food which fell from the table was sacred to them: this assumes an earlier offering of the firstfruits of the meal. Besides, eatables and drinkables were offered at the shrine, the offerer inviting the shades to join in his banquet; this became later the θεοξένια of the Dioscuri, Heracles and others. The shrines generally included the hero's grave in a walled precinct, with a sacred grove, a place for sacrifice, and a heroum with table, couch, and the necessary implements. One of these shrines is prettily described by Philostratus'. "Protesilaus," he says, "lies not in Troy, but here in the Chersonese, and the barrow there yonder on the left marks his tomb. Those elms were planted around the barrow by the nymphs, and on the trees they would seem to have written this law: that the branches which are turned towards Ilium flower early, and cast their leaves soon and die before the time, as was the lot of Protesilaus, while on the other side the trees live and do well....And the shrine, wherein, as our fathers have told us, the Medes wreaked their insolence, on which even smoked fish came to life they say, there it is, and you see how little is left of it. But then it was fine methinks, and by no means small, as may be guessed from the foundations. And this statue stood upon a ship, for the base is shaped like a prow, and an admiral dedicated it. But time has defaced it, and to be sure the people, by anointing it and fastening upon it their prayers."

The importance and the antiquity of hero-worship have been very much underrated. The heroes meet us everywhere, and in many instances one stands in the precinct of a more famous god. There was an ancient shrine of the Hero in the Olympian Altis; Apollo Ptoan stood side by side with a Hero Ptoan; Butes had an altar in the Erechtheum; Athena, and later Asclepius, threw the neighbouring healer Amynus and the Hero Physician into the shade; we have already met with heroes at Delphi. It is inconceivable that these heroes should have grown up in such places after the greater gods had been introduced; they were therefore on the spot before them. Take these facts in conjunction with the Homeric allusions to the daemons, and the Arcadian custom already mentioned, and the conclusion is forced upon us that we have here a system of worship which was older than the great gods. The Pelasgians inhabited Greece before those races which worshipped Zeus, Athena, and Apollo; and the Pelasgians spoke of their gods without names1, doubtless by some such collective title as Heroes or Daemons. The worship of the heroes continues throughout Greek history, but is on the wane and is not official, although recognised in public oaths where it is not safe to neglect any being who might have power2.

These conditions answer to what would be expected, if the heroes belonged to the worship of a subject population, over-mastered or conquered, but not crushed. Side by side with the great gods such worship would go on, as the hero-worship does, lingering longest in rural places or country villages, and in cities supported rather by the poor than by the rich and great. It lingered, too, in the country because so little was needed in the way of apparatus. No gorgeous temple was necessary, no organised priesthood; the family tomb was enough, or a modest shrine, not larger or more elaborate than the wayside chapels which at this day meet the traveller in Greece at every step. Indeed, there seems to be more than a chance resemblance between the ancient and the modern practice. The 'deserted chapels' or 'outside chapels'3 are for the most part simple cells, standing alone in the midst of a field or a patch of woodland. Scores and hundreds are ruined, and often nothing remains now but the foundations; many of them were built in Byzantine times, and may fairly be assumed to stand on spots hallowed, for whatever reason, from times still more ancient. Some adjoining sacred wells, or sacred trees, on which hang the rags of devout worshippers, and may have been holy places before the Greeks came to Greece. Some are still cared for and kept neat; within you find a rude altar, an icon or two, some tapers and a font, with the offerings of the faithful. But most of these chapels, even ruined ones where a village is near, are the scene of some yearly festivity. Their patron saints are remembered by the country folk; and on the saint’s day there is often a local Panegyris, and even the sacrifice of some animal with gilded horns. It would be rash to propound theories when so little is known; but it is surely not fanciful to believe that these shrines may often stand on the site of a hero-shrine, or some farmer’s chapel sacred to Pan or Demeter. Several are found near a medicinal spring, or ancient baths, and bear the name of the Saint Healer. There are chapels on most of the high hills of Greece, now sacred to St Elias; in ancient times Zeus was usually worshipped in such places, and he seems to have displaced local names.

Closely allied with these are the chthonian deities; who may themselves have been often deified heroes, but in any case, like them, have protective and retributive power, and were appealed to in sickness. Assuming that they really are deified ancestors, it becomes easy to understand why they so often go to worshipped Athena, to the Virgin. The Panagia tălsou, or Virgin of the Grove, just outside the city of Cos, may preserve a memory of the grove of the ancient shrine; there is no vestige of a grove there now.

in pairs. There would seem to have been an earlier local pair at Eleusis, which were displaced by the coming of others; for one relief, which bears the presentment of Demeter and the Maid, shows a pair of divinities seated by them, who are inscribed as the God and the Goddess\(^1\). Where the great gods are distinguished by appropriate titles, they may well have stepped into the places of such as these. Zeus Chthonius and Ge Chthonia\(^2\) may be an instance in point; and another pair, Zeus Meilichius and Meilichia\(^3\), have associations much the same as those of Demeter Chthonia\(^4\). In the Hellenistic age, Sarapis and Isis inherited the functions of many of the older pairs.

So much by way of introduction, and very necessary it is to the right understanding of the reliefs. As to the occasion of the offering, we have as a rule no key; except that we may assume the customary feast as a usual time of dedication, and sentiments of gratitude or propitiation for the cause. In this chapter we shall deal only with the general features of Dedications to Heroes, leaving aside for further examination those which are specifically inscribed as thank-offerings for healing or deliverance, and all that are associated with Asclepius and other healing gods. With the exception of this last important class, most of the dedications to the heroes known to us belong to the later periods of Greek history: but this is probably an accident, due to the fact that their shrines were less important and have not been so thoroughly examined.

An obvious offering would be the figure of the Hero. The base of one such has been discovered in Athens\(^5\), and in Argos another base which seems to have borne one of the Dioscuri\(^6\).

But (1) dedications to one of the Dioscuri are known, AM ii. 218; and (2) the dedicators’ names are not necessary (see chapter xii.). Fränkel quotes a similar dedication from Delphi BCH vii. 445. But the conclusive objections Statues of course stood in the shrine\(^1\), but the number is small of those specially dedicated. I may mention a figure of Heracles dedicated by a Greek near Rome\(^2\); and a statuette of Hades enthroned, one of the few such which are inscribed\(^3\). At Eleusis\(^4\) and at Tegea\(^5\) have been found hundreds of small statuettes representing Demeter enthroned, with high head-dress and long robes. Similar figures were offered in other shrines of importance, but there is little direct evidence for the Heroes. One shrine, however, that of Menelaus and Helen near Therapne in Laconia\(^6\), has been excavated, and has yielded an interesting series of figures\(^7\). About four hundred objects made of lead were found, including warriors armed with round shield and Corinthian helmet, mounted men, others stark-naked; and female figures of various types, some dressed in a long robe and holding a spear, others armed with the bow, others winged. There were also draped female figures with the polos head-dress, girls playing upon the flute, and what look like running or dancing men; there were animals, the lion and the horse, palm leaves and garlands, a Centaur, and other things\(^8\). Some of these may well have been meant for the figures of Menelaus and Helen, armed or dressed in various fashions because the type was not fixed, and the idea was that of a protecting power\(^9\). If the winged goddesses were not Helen (and no reason appears why they should have been Helen), perhaps they may belong to a yet earlier shrine of the ancient goddess called by the Greeks

8 The palms or garlands were perhaps held in the hands of figures, as we see them in terra-cotta statuettes (below, ch. viii.). The grills or gridirons which M. Artemis; similar figures were found in Apollo’s temple at Amyclae, which appear to be as old as the Mycenaean age. But the maidens with musical instruments are more likely to have been meant for the worshippers, or for some official who played a part in the ceremonies, dedicated as a memorial of the rite. Palmettes and wreaths, if offered independently, would be cheaper memorials of the act of worship. Animals must be interpreted in the light of the larger series of Olympia, Dodona, and the Cabirium. We never hear of the lion as a sacrificial animal; and if the horse was sacrificed to a hero, it was not sacrificed to Zeus. It is safer therefore to assume, that the lion is the hunter’s thank-offering, and the horse that of the warrior, the racer, or the breeder. At this date, the early sixth century, toys are probably out of the question. What to make of the centaur I do not know. In the Olympian Pelopeum were figures of men and animals, tripods, vases, rings, needles, articles of adornment and of value, and armour. A variety of objects, though not so great, was found in the Tarentine shrine of the Dioscuri. Here we have reclining male figures and seated female figures, probably combined together originally into a group like that of the Hero Feast; but very often a child is held by the female, or climbs upon the couch. There are also masks, and terra-cotta discs with a head in relief; heads of Pan, Silenus, and the Gorgon; and miniature vases, amphorae and others, in thousands. There are armed men and riders, a youth with an oil-flask, a satyr, a lad on a ram, and numbers of human heads covered with a ceremonial head-dress.

Fragments of bronze and fictile vases have been found bearing dedications to heroes: the hero’s name is commonly not given. It is impossible to say whether they were given because of their value, or for use, or as memorials of some act of ritual. That vases used in ritual were left at the shrine is proved by the tomb of Menidhi, but an inscription suggests some more special occasion. Part of a fictile vase, with an archaic dedication, was found in a place at Megara.

identified by another inscription as a hero shrine\(^1\). A vase found at Tarentum, bearing the hinder part of two horses, is dedicated to the Saviours\(^3\). A black fictile vase of the early fifth century, found at Mycenae, is inscribed “of the hero.” A trade guild dedicate a bronze vessel to their local hero in Phocis\(^4\). A vessel of stone from Cyprus bears a similar legend\(^5\). Altars are also dedicated to the heroes: to the Dioscuri for example\(^6\), or to Theseus in Attica\(^7\), to Heracles in Boeotia\(^8\). One at least of these was the gift of a priest on his election\(^9\); one was given in obedience to a dream\(^2\); others in return for preservation\(^10\): all are of later date than the fourth century. Diomedon of Cos, who left by will an estate for founding a sanctuary to Heracles, presented the furniture: table, couch, cups and mixing jar, lamps, brazier, censers, and a rug, together with two clubs and five golden crowns for the statues\(^11\). Herodotus speaks of gold cups being offered to Protesilaus\(^12\).

The dedication of arms and armour is also recorded, but the motive is not always clear. If Heracles could be invoked in battle\(^13\), then captured arms might be offered to him; and Philostratus mentions Mysian arms that hung by a medicinal spring\(^14\). But the shield and helmet which hang on the wall of a heroum, in a fifth century relief from Cumae\(^15\), or in later reliefs from Samos\(^16\), may be part of the hero’s own equipment.

We need do no more than mention the offerings of firstfruits in kind\(^17\), food, flowers, wreaths\(^18\), money\(^19\), and locks of hair; the first and last will be presently considered, and with the others we have no concern. We must, however, mention that models or images of the perishable things offered in the sacrifice were sometimes offered in stone, metal, or clay. Thus among the finds at a sanctuary of chthonian Persephone, unearthed at Tarentum, are a number of clay animals, and in particular a whole series of pigs. One Lysistrate at Athens dedicated to Heracles a stone shaped like a cake, with appropriate inscription. Statuette of the votary holding a pig or other sacrificial animal are known in several places; they may be mentioned here because the pig was a favourite offering to the chthonian deities.

But the most interesting dedications are the reliefs, which survive in large numbers. The hero is represented in various forms. Sometimes he is distinguished by attributes; as Heracles by club and lion-skin, the Dioscuri by their horses and hats of a peculiar shape. More often the heroes are stalwart young men, as Theseus is represented; or youths mounted on horseback, or standing beside their horses, with hounds or huntsmen. We learn from Philostratus that these were the forms under which the hero was supposed to appear to his worshippers. He tells us that if they showed themselves in a sweat, it portended storm and flood; if dusty, drought; blood on their arms meant plague and pestilence; and when none of these signs were seen, good seasons would follow and the earth bring forth her kindly fruits. Horse and snake are the general attributes of the hero, and the snake often twines round a tree, representing no doubt the sacred grove. The hero is often found associated with greater deities: as Neoptolemus at Delphi, Erechtheus at Athens, Triptolemus at Eleusis. The type of

5 It is hard to agree with Furtwängler (Coll. Sab. i. p. 27) that the horse has a hidden meaning, and is meant to symbolize the "mastery" of the ancestor over his descendants; or that the dog is there because "sacred" to certain deities. Horse and dog are the natural comrades of the hunter; and they cannot tell us what hero is depicted. They are properties in a character costume. See more in ch. xiv.
hero-reliefs is freely used for sepulchral, where the dead is heroized; but the votive character of many of these is clear from the inscriptions. I shall cite these as votive where they are so inscribed or not at all, but omit those which bear only the usual sepulchral formula.

The reliefs may be divided into three main classes: scenes of Ritual, scenes of Feasting, and scenes of the hero’s Activity. The third class splits into two groups, according as the horse does or does not form an integral part of the composition. The groups overlap to some extent.

1. Ritual: the Hero Enthroned. Chief and most ancient in this division are the Laconian reliefs mentioned above. Sometimes a heroized pair is seated upon the throne; or the female stands before the male, pouring the libation for him; many show the male figure alone, and two male figures even are found. The hero feeds a snake from his goblet; or a dog fawns upon him. He holds a pomegranate in one hand, the goblet in the other; or the woman holds a wreath. A horse’s head, or a whole horse, appears framed in the corner. Once a youth holding jumping-weights appears between two male figures. The later slabs are inscribed with names.

The same type recurs in Boeotia. An archaic slab from Lebadea shows the hero seated, with staff and goblet; in another, of the fifth century, a female pours the libation before him. From Patrae in Achaia we have a seated hero, with the female figure behind, and in front nine worshippers leading a ram; there is a shield hanging upon the wall, and a horsehead in frame. In the museum at Corfu is a terra-cotta slab, with a female pouring the libation before the enthroned hero, and a second female figure also enthroned. The hero feeding a snake recurs in Olbia, where we know Achilles was worshipt. In Berlin is a slab of uncertain origin, but of late date, in which we see the hero enthroned on a raised dais by the altar, and a troop of worshippers, one of whom leads a horse;

there is a tree with a snake twined round it; and on the wall hangs a case with tools, doubtless meant to indicate the dead man's calling. A fine third-century relief shows a bearded man seated in a chair, under which is a snake; a female pours the libation. The type resembles Asclepius, but is not that god. Sometimes the hero stands in a sacrificial scene before the altar, as in a relief from Samos.

2. The Hero reclining, and partaking of a feast. Of this type, which is known as the Hero Feast or the Death Feast,

The last completely disposes of the attempts to explain these as Family Feast simply. The history of the type is dead against supposing them to have originally referred to the mythical Feast in the some three hundred examples remain, the oldest of which comes from Tegea. Most of them belong to Attica, and the type is rare in Peloponnesian and the southern islands, somewhat more common in Thrace, Asia Minor, and the northern isles; in Boeotia and Thessaly it is practically displaced by the Rider type. One example comes from Naucratis.

The Tegean relief is broken, and the reclining hero has lost all but his feet. A seated female figure turns towards him, and before her is a naked lad holding a wreath uplifted in his left hand. A fifth-century relief from the Peiraeus shows the hero reclined and holding a bowl, while the female sits as before; a boy draws wine from a mixing-bowl, a dog eats the Underworld; but this idea may have become associated with the old type in later times. The actual moment represented may perhaps be, as von Fritze believes, the dessert; but too much stress must not be laid on the fact that cakes of pyramidal shape are "not known in the death cult" (349).

Do we know everything about the death cult? It is equally rash to deny the sacrificial character where the hero himself pours the libation: he may be supposed to do so as head of the family. The same type is used for the gods, where there can be no question of a family meal. Milchhöfer points out that while only one (possibly) is found in a cemetery, many are found in shrines: Sybel 3992, 4093, 4272, 4326, 4694, 4897, 4953, 4983, 4985.

scraps under the table, and a worshipper is present. An altar for incense often appears, on or near the table; the crater is constant, and the hero holds a drinking horn. Fruit, especially pomegranates, and cakes lie on the table, the cakes being of a pyramidal shape. Dog and snake often appear, and the horse is hinted at. Rarely we see a boat, or a man in a boat.
Weapons occasionally hang on the wall. Sometimes two male figures recline together, or a woman alone, who perhaps offers drink to the serpent.

The Death-Feast type has been found, as might have been expected, in the Asclepicium at Athens, in the shrines of Am-phiaraus in Oropus and Rhamnus, and at Athens in company with an Amphiaraus relief. These facts go to show both the votive character of the type, and the heroic character of Asclepius and Amphiaraus. The type of face varies, often approaching that of Zeus or Hades. The same type of relief is associated with Asclepius, with Dionysus, with Hercules and the Muses, with Hades, with Hecate, with the Dioscuri, with Zeuxippus and Basileia, later with Isis.
The heroic figures sometimes have the look of portraits.
Once the scene is found on a painted vase, and the type is known in terra-cotta groups.

A combination of the types of Sacrifice and Feast appears on some monuments. Thus worshippers are seen in the corner, assisting at the feast with uplifted hands\(^1\). The heroes take no account of them, and they stand as accessories outside the picture, just as the dedicators kneel unnoticed in some Italian painting\(^2\). So too we see victims and sacrificial implements forming part of the festive scene\(^3\).

!Fig. 4. Hero Feast, from Peiraeus. Le Bas, Voyage, pl. 54.

3. We come now to the third group, where the Hero appears as Rider or Hunter. In a fifth-century relief from Cumae\(^4\) the hero is a youth clad in chlamys and petasus, and bæstrides a prancing steed; behind him appears the heroized wife. A group of worshippers, of smaller size, face the pair, their hands uplifted; on the wall hang shield and helmet. There are no offerings and no altar, but a hare fawns on the smallest figure. Both hunting and war are thus hinted at in this scheme, and the combination is clearer still in another example from Tanagra\(^1\). The rider is armed in the cuirass; behind him a slave, with the hunting-club, and game on his shoulder, holds fast to the horse’s tail. A heroized female figure bears bowl and jug for the libation. Often the hero leads his horse, as in a fourth-century relief from Tanagra\(^2\), where an altar is present, and libation and adoration are repeated. A fine Attic piece of the fifth century\(^3\) contains two divisions. In the upper is a heroum, containing a statue, with a large heroic figure seated on either side; below, the hero unarmed leads his horse, the dog following behind. One adorer and an altar complete the group. There is only one early example from Attica of this type\(^4\); but both motives, the warrior and the hunter, become regular for sepulchral monuments. Boeotia presents us with half a hundred monuments of the type now in question, many of them being carved on small altars which were doubtless used for the rite depicted\(^5\). The hero now bestrides his horse, now stands by it; he may be armed; the horse approaches an altar, or even places a hoof upon it. A female figure is often present, ready for the libation\(^1\); and there are troops of worshippers\(^2\). The hunt-motive only occurs on the tablet from Tanagra described above. Nearly all are early; one of the fifth century\(^3\), several of the fourth\(^4\); the best show Attic work or influence.

From Thessaly comes a unique example; there is the youth and the horse, and a group of worshippers; but there is also a female figure enthroned\(^5\). The sepulchral slabs from this district, when inscribed, are all dedicated to the heroized dead\(^6\).
The hero on horseback reappears in Laconia, and a beast is offered to him\(^7\). We shall come later to the Dioscuri, who occur in this scheme. From Argolis we have an actual hunting scene, an armed rider attacking a boar; the altar, tree, and snake occur on this slab\(^8\). In a Thyrean relief\(^9\), the youth holds the horse's bridle, whilst he feeds a snake which coils about a tree.
On the tree hanging are a shield and a sword, on the ground lance and body-armour, whilst a boy carries the helmet. The type is known in Pergamus, with a female in the divine aspect, and no worshippers\(^10\).

Examples have been found in Rhodes\(^11\), in Lemnos\(^12\), and in Thasos\(^13\), but in the small islands only one so far\(^14\). This is more likely to be due to accident, or to the greater rarity of all works of fine art, than to the nature of the ground\(^15\). There are no early examples from the less Greek parts of the Greek world; but the type is common in Thrace during the later periods and the age of Roman dominion, and then appears in Macedon, Asia Minor, and even Illyria. In Thrace, several were found in a hero-shrine. The Thracian copies are inscribed ‘to the lord hero’, with or without the word εὐχήν, or to the heroized dead, one to Apollo, and one to the Dioscuri. The hero rides or stands by the horse; dog and altar appear, and often the tree with coiling serpent. Sometimes he hunts the boar. Once a woman is present, and once perhaps a worshipper.

The Macedonian examples are all dedicated to the heroized dead. Among them we meet with the boar hunt, and the snake coiling about a tree. In Illyria the rider is armed, and gallops with lance in rest. Most of the Asiatic types belong to the heroized dead. Smyrna has produced several, and Cyzicus a few, amongst the latter being one dedicated to Apollo. One of the Smyrna reliefs, as may be seen below, has travelled far from the original conception, including as it does an honorific inscription. From Pergamus came two rider-reliefs with worshippers, dedicated to the Hero Pergamus. A large number have come to light in Phrygia or Pisidia, inscribed to the Preserving God. Coloë has two, inscribed to the heroized dead, one of them to Gaius Germanicus Caesar.

The enthroned figure is combined with the horse in an Athenian relief\(^1\). The rider is also found combined with the Feast type, as in a slab from Tarentum. Here two male figures recline at the festive table, with the usual accessories, whilst a man leads a horse towards them\(^2\).

4. In the last type, the horse forms no integral part of the scene. The Hero stands free, and is usually armed; in an Argive relief he stands before an altar on which a boy is laying fuel\(^3\). In others, the female figure is over against him, pouring a libation. The oldest of this class known comes from Tegea, and is archaic\(^4\). Another example is in the Corfu museum, and has worshippers\(^5\). In Attica\(^6\) and in Sicily\(^7\) we meet with the same scheme, and there are others. Or the Hero gives the libation to a snake; as in certain examples from Sparta\(^8\) and Tarentum\(^9\).

A transitional type, between this and the thank-offering for a victory, is seen in the piece from Palermo, where Victory bearing a fillet flies towards the hero\(^10\); and in another, where Victory pours the libation\(^11\).

We shall now briefly consider dedications made to particular Heroes, and see how far these fall into the classes defined above. Dedications made expressly for stated occasions, such as gratitude for healing or deliverance, will however be excepted, as I propose to take these in the succeeding chapters\(^12\).

restored by Rohl τοι κόροι Θείκει Να-\(\mu\)ρτις, as a dedication by the youths to Theocles, a man. It seems incredible that the dedication could take this form so early and leave no other trace; in late periods of course it is common enough. It is hardly easier to suppose the noun Θείκει to be accusative, as this also is a late formula. There seems to be no doubt as to the reading; the hero’s staff comes between the two first words, so it is unlikely that \(\Delta\)ι\(o\)σκό\(u\)ρο\(u\) can be meant. But perhaps the dedication is meant for one only; see p. 30.

Turning first to the chthonian deities, as most closely allied to what we have treated as the earliest type of worship, we find that Hades or Pluto\(^1\) has more of the heroic than the divine about him. There appears to be only one temple recorded where Hades is worshiped under this name and alone, that seen by Pausanias in Elis\(^2\). He is generally associated, as Hades or Pluto, with the Maid and Demeter or with one of them\(^3\); sometimes with other heroic figures, Triptolemus, Eubuleus, or Iacchus; sometimes he goes by the name of Zeus Chthonius\(^4\), or of Buleus\(^5\). The practice of lectisternia is certain for Athens\(^6\), and probable for his other centres of worship. A terra-cotta relief from the Malian Locri\(^7\) shows a remarkable likeness to the Spartan Type 1. Scherer can hardly be wrong in his interpretation of this work as Hades and Persephone\(^8\). The pair, a bearded male figure, with wreath, and a female figure with diadem and veil, sit side by side; he holds a spray of flowers, narcissus apparently, and she a large bunch of corn and a cock. The arm of the throne terminates in a snake. This is all which remains; one quarter of the original slab. Two reliefs of the Feast Type 2 came to light at Eleusis; these clearly represent the lectisternia already mentioned. They are not of early date or of great artistic merit; but they have considerable interest as attesting the cult of a chthonian pair in Eleusis beside the Two Goddesses. The first shows two pairs, each seated by a separate table, with a pilaster between. The pair on the right are insscribed To the God and To the Goddess; the others though not inscribed are probably meant for Demeter and the Maid. A youth holding a jug over a large amphora completes the scene.

The other, but a fragment, bears the heads, both inscribed, of Pluto and the Goddess side by side; Triptolemus was present, and his torch still remains; so was Eubuleus.

The third type does not appear to be used in connexion with Pluto, but the fourth is found in a late dedication from Macedonia; where the god, his body naked from the waist upwards, stands beside Cerberus.

Of other heroic personages, the Dioscuri are represented on the oldest known monuments, and these from Sparta, where they had a chthonian character, and where their worship was very ancient. They appear chiefly in Types 3 and 4: as a pair of naked youths, without attributes, mounted or usually standing beside their horses, or standing opposite each other without horses, or holding a wreath. The inscription on the last example declares that the dedication is made for fear of the wrath of the sons of Tyndarus. A later relief, which may be votive, shows two youths on horseback, clad in chiton and chlamys, but without the distinctive hat. They are beardless, and their hair is bound with a diadem. In another relief two youths stand with an altar between; each holds a spear, and one has a bowl, the other a jug. Sometimes they are armed with swords, sometimes their feet clad in boots. The two urns frequently appear, and in one case snakes are wreathed round them. A table also appears with something upon it, the silphium no doubt which we have read of. Animals appear at their feet, and of course the snake; while cocks may be seen in the gable.

The identification even when no horses are seen, is made certain by the dedication of one at least. A dedication is found to one of the two alone, which makes it possible to assume the same thing for a fragmentary relief which has been much discussed. One or two late examples are offered by a company of persons, probably those who took part in some great feast. Here a female figure appears, doubtless Helen. A relief found in Cythera shows that the cult was practised there: and a dedication to them comes also from Thessaly. Dedications go on until Roman times. The stars, which later are identified with these heroes as protectors at sea, do not appear; but if the story of Lysander be correctly interpreted, they were known in the fifth century. At Tarentum the youths often ride or drive in a chariot.

The Feast Type is fully represented in a series of reliefs found at Tarentum. The Dioscuri, on horseback, are seen approaching the feast which is set out ready for them, or reclining at table, their horses sometimes appearing in the background. There are always two amphorae placed at the two sides, one for each. These amphorae are associated with the libation in the ritual type, where the Dioscuri themselves pour it upon the altar; or they stand beside the two youths, who are unclothed and without attributes; or they stand upon a table, while the youths raise a stlengis to their heads, or drive past. The amphorae may signify either the feast or the libation; and where they stand quite alone it is impossible to say which.

Certain Spartan reliefs show two amphorae, sometimes standing upon a table. A slab, of the second century perhaps, bears the twins clothed, with the typical hats, and standing upon a raised base or platform. A worshipper reaches out his hand to touch one of two large amphorae, which stand also on a high base; below is a small altar, with a pig carved in relief upon it. There is a boat in the background.

The snake is frequent on these reliefs, and the cock is also found. We shall meet these beings later as saviours and protectors, especially of those who use the sea, and as givers of victory. There remains the base of one statue at least dedicated to them; and the little figures two together in a cradle, which have been found in several different places, are supposed to be they or their sons. Altars dedicated to them have also been found. A number of slabs bearing snakes only are in the local museum at Sparta; these may be connected with the Dioscuri, but there is nothing save the place of finding to suggest it. Dedications to the Dioscuri by seafarers do not meet us early; we may instance a late one from the island Megiste.

Heracles enthroned (Type 1) is to be seen on a relief of Attic character, found in Andros, and belonging to the fifth century. He sits before a temple or palace, whilst a female pours wine into his goblet.

In the fourth century the sacrificial scheme takes a different form. Lysistrate dedicates to him a stone carved to resemble a cake or loaf, with a relief: Heracles, wearing the lionskin, stands by a blazing altar, towards which a boy leads a sacrificial swine; a group of women and children complete the scene. A relief from Ithome shows Heracles standing before a shrine, beardless, with club and lionskin; there are worshippers, the victims are ox and sheep. An ox alone is offered on a similar relief, and there are remains of others. In one relief Heracles appears to be holding out his hand for something.

The Feasting Type (2) is represented by a late relief from Athens, where Heracles appears as one of a group of heroic figures feasting, others perhaps being Apollo and the Muses. The scene is fanciful, including not only the apparatus of the feast, but trees and little winged loves1.

Even the third type is found, although Heracles is no horseman. On a rough Rhodian piece of Roman date he appears club in hand mounted upon an ass2.

The fourth type appears with characteristic variations. In a fourth century piece from Thebes3, Heracles, with club and lionskin, stands before a Doric shrine. He holds the horn of plenty in his right hand, and another heroic personage, perhaps meant for Dionysus (for he has the thyrsus), touches the horn in the hand of Heracles. There are fragments of other figures in the scene. He also appears conjoined with Athena and a personification of Demus or Academus4. A relief of the fourth century, inscribed to Heracles Averter of Ill, represents the hero with Hermes on the steps of a shrine5.

His aid in war is acknowledged by the statues of Athena and Heracles dedicated by Thrasybulus in the shrine of Heracles6; and in games, by a relief of Roman date7. The hero lies resting, his weapons hung on a tree, and the inscription commemorates an ephieic triumph.

His figure also appears on decree-reliefs, with Athena for instance8.

Reliefs of the fourth type exist which are dedicated to Theseus. He is a youth, with cloke on shoulder, and cap, otherwise naked, and worshippers appear by his side in the usual attitude9. The hero looks very much like Heracles, except for the costume; but where the lionskin lacks, it is safer to suppose that Theseus will be meant. Sosippos the dedicator is portrayed; and another male figure, from its size not human, perhaps a personification of Academus.

One relief, if properly assigned to Theseus, is of the sacrificial type (1): the hero stands in front of a Doric shrine, club in hand, and holds the horn of a sacrificial bull in token of acceptance. There are three worshippers.

These types are also connected with greater deities. Reliefs of the Hero Enthroned are inscribed to Zeus Philios or to Sabazios.

The Rider type is used for Apollo. As a rule there is no clue to the occasion of these dedications. We find, however, now and then, instances of such as are usually connected with the great gods: victory in war or the games, fulfilment of a vow, even firstfruits or acknowledgment of prosperity in trade. In later times, we meet with bases which probably carried commemorative or honorific statues. One from Attica is dedicated to Eubouleus; others by bodies of men, as the Heracleot thiasus at Megara, or what appears to be a company of athletes at Cefalu in Sicily. Hermon of Oropus gives an offering to Heracles on completing his term of public office, and a board of religious overseers acknowledges to Theseus the vote of thanks and the crown which they had received for their services. Father and sons combine in an offering to Heracles. The votive formula is used for the gift of a colonnade at Coronea\(^1\), and elsewhere it is coupled with the late addition “to the state\(^2\).” A dedication to the hero Eurymedon was found in Attica\(^3\).

It remains to point out that some of these relief types became in later times traditional for tombstones, completely losing the votive character. The transition may be seen in a tombstone from Attica, where beneath the figure of a horseman are the words “Theodorus the Hero\(^4\)” Boeotia is richest in this type. There a great number of horseman-reliefs have been found on tombs: sometimes with the horseman alone\(^5\), others with the addition of an altar\(^6\), others again with mourners in the attitude of adoration\(^7\). So far is the meaning forgotten, that the horse must needs appear on a woman’s tomb; so Musa holds the animal’s bridle, standing beside an altar\(^8\). So too the same scheme is used where three people are entombed, two men and a woman\(^9\). Then the old conception dies, giving rise to two developments. On the one hand, Hero is used as synonymous with ‘dead,’ like the German selig or divus of Roman emperors\(^10\), and the relief disappears. On the other hand, the horseman survives as a decoration for the tomb of soldiers, as in the monument of Dexileos and others in Attica\(^11\). It would appear that statues on horseback were often placed by the tomb of dead men, as in a scene depicted on a beautiful Attic vase\(^12\).

The Hunt-motive also appears on tombstones\(^13\), but more rarely; it is however common in sarcophagus reliefs of Roman times. The Banquet type is also found on tombs, although it did not like the horseman set the example for a series of monuments wholly sepulchral. Examples are known from

NOTE ON THE MODERN REPRESENTATIVES OF ANCIENT SHRINES.

I have tried in vain to find some satisfactory enquiry into the genealogy of modern Greek churches and chapels. The local chapels are not marked on the map, and no traveller has taken the trouble to note their names. It would serve no useful purpose to print here all those I have collected; such as seemed to throw light on the heroes have been given above. I will add a few more churches and chapels which probably stand on the site of ancient temples. Some indeed are built on the old foundations or with the materials of the old building; amongst them are one or two hero-shrines, but most of these have remained unnoticed. References given only by volume and page refer to Frazer's Pausanias, where authorities may be found cited.

When the earth and its growths were regarded by the simple soul as possest or protected by unknown powers, any intrusion upon new dominions was thought to be dangerous. To clear the virgin forest or reclaim waste lands for the plow, to dig the foundations of a house, to build a bridge, was to disturb the primeval owners of the place and made necessary a solemn sacrifice. It seems to have been very common to sacrifice human life on such occasions, as we see from the legend of the death of Remus, the figures of straw thrown off the Wooden Bridge at Rome, or traditions on Greek soil like those of the Bridge of Arta.

Often a plot of land is left barren, or a clump of trees unhewn, to be the abode of the spirit which has been disturbed.

1 See Dar. and Sagl. s.v. Dekate; Pauly-Wissowa, Real-Encyc. s.v. ἀπαρχή, δεκάτη.
2 "In Arabia, the local earth-demons are still propitiated by sprinkling the blood of a sacrifice when new land is broken up, a new house built, or a new well opened" : Robertson Smith, Religion of the Semites, 159 note, who discusses the custom.
In Greece, when land was occupied by conquest or colonization, a portion of the land was "cut off" (τέμενος) for the god’s habitation. The sacred grove in an eastern village is probably the last remains of the primeval forest, which since the world began has never been touched by plow or dung with the spade. So in Greece, we find often enough the sacred tree in a village square, as the willow of Samos and the holy olive of Delos, the plane tree at Delphi, Helen’s plane at Sparta; or the sacred grove, as the olive groves of Athens, or the groves of Artemis with their game which no man might kill. This may be the origin of the grove at the hero’s shrine, of the speaking oaks of Dodona, and of other trees associated with divine beings; which like their attendant animals appear sometimes to have been selected for no other reason than that they were found on the spot. But when animals were bred for use, and agriculture brought to men the kindly fruits of the earth, their gratitude for past favours and lively sense of favours to come would naturally prompt acknowledgment.

8 Pausanias tells of the tragic death of Hymnetho, and how she was buried and a shrine made in her honour; adding that all the “olives and other trees” which grew there were sacred to her (ii. 28. 7). Victors’ crowns of wild olive, pine or parsley, and laurel were taken from the trees or plants which grew near. A similar reason is given for the use of λόγος at Samos Ath. xv. 673 d, and ινν 675 ο ἐπὶ τὸν κίοσνον στέ- φανον ἥλθον αὐτόματον τε καὶ πολίν δύτα καὶ κατὰ πάσα τόπον γεννώμενον (Philo- nides). Of course explanatory tales spring up. For the animals compare Ath. xiv. 655 a—b and Philonides ἐν Ὑπάν μὲν φατι γίγνεσθαι πόλει φώκες, ἐν Ἀθηναίσ δὲ γλαύκας· ἡ Κύπρος ἔχει πελείας διαφόρους· ἡ δ’ ἐν Σάμῳ Ἡρα τὸ χρυσόν, φασίν, ὄρηδων γένος τοὺς καλλιμόρφους καὶ περιβλέπτους ταύς. ο περὶ δὲ τὸ ἱερὸν τῆς παρθένου ἐν Δέρφε εἰσὶν οἱ καλομέμενοι ὄρνηθες μελεγρίδες. The commonness of owls at Athens gave rise to the proverb γλαύκα Ἀθηναζ. The owl on Athena’s hand, or on the coins, may have been originally nothing more than a mark of differentiation. The inevitable result was that these creatures came to be regarded as sacred. I do not suggest the same origin for them all; the mouse of Apollo Smintheus, for example, or the bull of Zagreus.
The beneficence of the earth deities must be recognised, or it might be withheld: hence vintage and harvest time were natural seasons for sacrifice and worship. The offering of firstlings or firstfruits, then, appears to be partly an act of propitiation, by which precious things hitherto forbidden might be made available; partly an act of gratitude and hope. The rite itself, in some cases at least, had a sacramental character, the god and his worshippers being conceived of as partaking of the same food: a striking parallel to the interpretation already suggested of the Hero-Feast. The idea that these ceremonies made it lawful to enjoy the gifts of the gods is expressly vouched for in Greece.

We are not now concerned with proving the principles here assumed, nor with illustrating them by examples. It is worth while however to note one or two significant points in the practices of savage tribes. One is, that firstfruits are often offered to the ghosts of departed ancestors. So we have seen the funeral feast held in the shrines of the heroized ancestors in Sparta; and firstfruits and tithe offered to a hero. Again, the kings or chiefs often take the place of the gods, or, when ritual is developed, the priests have at least a share. So in the Greek temples, the priest always had his perquisite of a slaughtered victim. Where the tribal feast became a social institution, the tithe still continued to be paid at the feast. And again, firstfruits were offered not only from corn and vine, but from flocks or fish or the produce of the chase; and loaves or cakes are sometimes made from the sacred portion of grain.

1 For the principles here laid down, and examples in proof, see Frazer, Golden Bough ii. 318 ff., 459 ff.; Robertson Smith, Religion of the Semites, 240 ff., 463. In Frazer p. 468 the Tonga chieftain thanks the gods for their bounty in favouring the land with a good prospect of harvest, and prays that their beneficence may be continued. Where the thing is not sought for use, it was natural to dedicate the whole: thus Theseus, after mastering the Marathonian bull, sacrificed it to Athena in the name of the township of Marathon (Paus. i. 27. 10).

4 Frazer, 463 (Malay), 464 (Fiji), 466 (Solomon Islands), etc. So the Scythians did, Herod. iv. 71. The Magnetes of Thessaly offered firstfruits of their herb simples to Cheiron, himself of the nature of heroes: Plut. Symp. iii. 1. 3. The Athenians offered firstfruits to the shades of the μαραθυνομάχαι: Thuc. iii. 58 (πάντων ἀπαρχάς).

The practice of making up a sheaf of corn or the like into the shape of a human figure, and preserving it until the next year, is also found in connexion with the harvest celebrations.

We know so little of the every-day life of the Greek farmer, that it is impossible to say how far he kept up the ancient rites. Were Stratoniceus and Eudemus alone, when the one left a plot of ground unsown in his field in honour of Pan, and the other dedicated in his a shrine to Zephyrus, because he had helped him to winnow the corn? or the old vinedresser in Philostratus, when he set apart a corner for his hero Protesilans? What was that local precinct, where the farmers are bidden sacrifice to Asclepius and Hygieia? or the

This was the annual offering set apart to Broonie, a household deity whose annual services were thus secured.” Shetland Folk-Lore, John Spence: Lerwick 1899, p. 174.
5 “In a corner of the looder [in a Shetland water mill] stood a toyeeg (a small straw basket), containing as much corn as would be a hurd o’ burstin.” This was the annual offering to the Water Neugle, in order to insure the good offices of his godship. When this was neglected, the Neugle would sometimes grasp the tirl and stop the mill, and could only be dislodged by dropping a fire-brand down by the lightning tree” (p. 172). So in the N.-W. provinces of India, firstfruits of sugar and corn are dedicated before use: North Ind. Notes and Queries, 1893, § 203. An old Boeotian inscr., IGS i. 1670, appears to dedicate firstfruits to Demeter. So the farmer, in exercising the mice, gives them a plot for themselves: εὐρικόν μῦν τοῦ εὐνάθει καταλαμβανόμενον μὴ με ἄδικες τε μῆτε ἀλλὸν ἑάσητε’ δίδωμι γὰρ ἀγρόν ὑμῖν τῶν, Geoponica xiii. 5. 4. Compare the story of Poseidon’s temple on disputed ground, Paus. ii. 22. 4. It is the same idea which makes the Pythia ordain that the Cirraean land should lie waste: Aesch. private plot at Cnidus, consecrated to the infernal deities? Was the shepherd of Theocritus alone, when he feasted at the altar of Demeter at the threshing-floor, and did he perchance dress up a sheaf to represent bounteous Mother Earth? These questions can never be answered now; but it does not follow by any means that there was nothing of the kind because we hear so little about it. There needs a reaction from city life, and the self-conscious art of a later age, to suggest that rustic merrymakings are worth describing. But when the glorious prime of the ancient cities is past, and they have all come under the iron rule of Rome, then the old country customs, which had survived so many vicissitudes, come into our view. Such scenes as Longus describes in his pretty pastoral tale could not be the invention of his own day; and I make no apology for quoting from him in illustration of the time when Peisistratus was not yet born. "A cave of the nymphs there was," he writes, "being a great rock hollow within and rounded without. The images of the nymphs themselves were carved out of stone: unshod feet, arms bare to the shoulder, hair loose and flowing down over the neck, a girdle about the waist, a smile on the brow; their whole aspect was as it were a troop of dancers. The mouth of the cave was in the centre of the great rock. And from it a spring of water bubbled up into a rippling stream, so that a delightful meadow stretcht before the cave, with much fresh grass fed by the water. And there were offerings of milk-pails and cross-flutes and pipes and reeds, dedicated there by the older shepherds." Hard by was a pine tree, with an image of Pan; horned, goat-footed, syrinx in hand. Here the country folk worship the nymphs, sacrificing to them and praying them to interpret their dreams, and in the spring-time wreathing the heads of the statues with flowers\(^1\). After the vintage and wine-treading, he says of his rustic pair, "in great joy they worshipped the nymphs, bringing them bunches of grapes as firstfruits after the vintage\(^2\). Indeed, they had not neglected this in the former time, always waiting upon them as they set out for their pasturing, and worshipping them when they returned; and always they brought some offering, flower or fruit or fresh leafage, or again a libation of milk. And this in time brought them a recompense from the goddesses\(^3\)." Songs and pipings and dancings in their honour were not wanting\(^4\). In misfortune, Daphnis vows the sacrifice of a goat for help, and an answer is given in dreams\(^5\). His prayer heard, he chooses the best of his flock, crowns him with ivy, slays and flays him, and hangs up the skin at the holy place, adding thereto a libation of milk. The flesh, after a portion offered, and the rest of the milk, he and Chloe themselves partake of. The same ceremony, with a libation of wine, is done before the statue of Pan. Limbs and skulls of animals, part of the sacrifice no doubt, were hung up on trees by the farmers to ensure fertility\(^6\).

Some such scenes as these we may fairly assume to have been common in Greece from early times. Homer alludes as a matter of course to the altars of the nymphs, where all wayfarers did sacrifice\(^7\), to their caves\(^8\), and to their dances\(^9\). The god might vary with place and age, appropriate titles being added to the greater gods\(^10\), or late-comers taking over the rights and duties of their predecessors as the successive tenants of the oracular cave did at Delphi. We find not only the local hero Agenor blessing the Argive flocks at his tomb, nor the national hero Heracles associated with Hermes and Cybele amongst the mountains; but the "hero" and the "heroine," nameless, coupled with Zeus Anthaleus in a farmer's calendar, Demeter guardian of flocks in Sicily as she was giver of corn, Apollo as shepherd's god in many places, perhaps Aphrodite even when she rides on the goat. Sicilians make prayer for prosperity to the Mothers, and offer all kinds of acknowledgments. Grain is offered to Cybele. But the countryman's eyes were generally turned to Artemis and Pan, two of the most ancient deities of the Greeks, coupled with Hermes and the Nymphs. Wreaths of corn were offered yearly to Artemis in Patrae. Artemis is usually worshiped by herself, until later she became associated with Apollo; but the others go in a group together for the most part. The Nymphs were often confused with the Graces and the Seasons, but each group seems to have had its own particular dances.

The offerings were made to Hecate also, as to Hermes, at their wayside statues, cakes, cheese, and fish. Firstfruits were also offered to Hestia.

The worship of Pan and the Nymphs was widespread in Greece, and the literary tradition probably gives a very inadequate idea of their importance. As the peasant of to-day fears the mysterious Neraidhes, who can bewitch him to death, or strike him deaf, dumb, or blind; so in ancient days the dweller in solitudes feared that panic madness or nymph-stroke which the god and his woodland elves could plague him with. Pan ruled the mountains and the forests; gave luck to the hunter, and kept the flocks from harm. He appears in classical times as the national god of Arcadia, where Artemis was also at home, and where if anywhere we should expect to find the most ancient faith and ritual of Greece: but his sanctuaries are dotted over the land from Cape Malea to Macedon. In particular, wherever there is a notable cave or grotto, there we are likely to find him enshrined. At Delphi, when Apollo was a new-comer, Pan and his nymphs took refuge in the Corycian cave. It was a cave of the Nymphs in which Ulysses hid his treasures when he returned to his native isle. In Attica the popularity of Pan dates from the Persian invasion, although the story implies that he was there worshiped before. The people consecrated a grotto to him under the acropolis, and establishd a torch-race in his honour. At Vari there was a cave and garden of the Nymphs, and a grotto of Pan on Parnes. A shrine of the Nymphs down by the Ilissus was known to Plato, who in speaking of it implies that such a sight was common; and to Euripides, who alludes to the votive tablets hung in these places. The nymphs had caves in Cithaeron, Samicum, Siphnos, Pan at Marathon, and Calamata. The belief in a plurality of Pans, which has left some traces, may be due to the number of places where he was worshiped, aided no doubt (but at what date first we know not) by a popular derivation of the name from πᾶς. His general favour is attested by the sixth book of the Anthology, where he receives more dedications than any other deity there mentioned\(^1\). It is remarkable that in the matter of temples and shrines he falls far behind most of the others\(^2\); but there are traces that his power had dwindled from what it once was\(^3\). He is in fact essentially a deity of country life; and in his worship bears to the great city gods much the same relation as the heroes. We are not surprised to find, then, that he is neglected in after days. "They don’t treat me as I deserve at all," Lucian makes him say\(^4\), "far worse indeed than I might have expected, when I defended them from all that barbarian garboil. However, they do come up twice or thrice in the year, with an unmistakable billygoat smelling most rank; then they sacrifice him, and make a feast of the flesh, calling me to witness their jollity and honouring me with a hand clap or two." So we find the farmer or breeder, if he were able, consulting the famous oracles in his own interest. At Dodona, the only place which has yielded a series of such documents hitherto\(^5\), Cleotas enquires of Zeus and Dione whether he shall have profit and benefit of his sheep-rearing\(^6\); others ask how they are to prosper in their business\(^7\), or desire a recommendation to some other "god or hero" who may be depended upon\(^8\). I have already pointed out how the later gods usurp the rights of the earlier. At this stage differentiation comes in: thus in a Rhodian inscription, offerings of grapes are made to Bacchus, of sheaves to Deo, of olives to Athena¹.

We may take it, then, that the offerings of firstfruits recorded in the Anthology, though late in date and at times fanciful, do not misrepresent the ancient custom. Sheaves are offered to Deo in thanks for a good harvest²; even if the earing be small, she must have her share, a handful of corn and a few seeds laid on a wooden stool³. Or the same offering is made to the Nymphs, as a tithe of winnowing⁴. At the vintage, grapes are offered to Aphrodite⁵; grapes, figs, and pomegranates are the portion of Priapus⁶. So the herdsman offers his milk to Pan⁷, the bee-keeper his honey⁸. The firstfruits may also take the form of cakes dedicated to Pan and Priapus⁹, or Hermes of the Roads¹⁰; a cake is laid in a basket on the threshing-floor as a thank-offering to Demeter¹¹. Three jars of wine are offered to Bacchus and the Satyrs as the firstfruits of three vineyards¹².

There is a striking parallel to these ancient customs in the communion feast of a modern panegyris, especially when this falls in harvest time or vintage. In some places, the pious will eat nothing of grape or grain until it has been blest by the priest at the harvest home. The service on the saint's day always begins about sunrise; and after it is over, the holy bread (which has been provided by some of the more well-to-do of the company) is handed round. The people emerge: in the precinct stand little tables, on which stand bunches of grapes and small decanters of mastick, also a gift, which all taste of, as they eat the pieces of consecrated bread, wishing each other a happy year in the set formula. Then too in the church may sometimes be seen offerings in kind, when they are such as to last: as the sponge-fisher's tribute, chosen from his last takings, which hangs beside the icon of the patron saint. Even a last trace of the Corn-maiden seems to survive, in a curious plaited mat made of the ripe ears, hung up in the peasants' houses\(^1\), which bears a distant resemblance to a begowned human figure.

In like manner the huntsman paid his devours to Artemis Agrotera, or Pan, or other deities of the woodland, in local shrines or under a tree\(^2\): where he hung up the head, horns, and skin, and offered a share of the catch\(^3\). One of the local shrines is described by Philostratus\(^4\), and another may be seen on a marble relief\(^5\). "There is a shrine of the goddess at hand," says Philostratus, "and an image smooth with age, and the heads of boars and of bears; and thereby live wild beasts at large, fawns and wolves and hares, all tame and fearing man not at all." Evidence has at last been found of the antiquity of these customs, in the temple of Artemis at Lusi; where have been found stags' horns with boars' tusks and the teeth of bears in numbers, apparently the relics of early offerings\(^6\). Xenophon offered a tenth of his hunting to Artemis in the private shrine which he built\(^7\). King Philip slew a wild bull at Arbela, whose horns and skin he consecrated to Heracles\(^8\);

\(^1\) See my paper in Folk-Lore, vii. 147, with photograph. I have seen these as far east as Lesbos, where they are regular, and rarely on the mainland of Greece. The people call them ψάθα, 'mat,' or στάρι, 'corn,' and have forgotten what they once meant.

\(^2\) Diodorus (iv. 22) tells of an impious man, εν μεν τοις ἐμπροσθεν χρήσει εἰσώθην τῶν ληφθέντων θηρίων τὰς κεφαλὰς καὶ τῶν πόδας ἀναπίθηναι τῇ Ἀρτέμιδι καὶ προσηλούν τῶν δένδρων, who dedicated one to himself, with disastrous results.

The altar at Delos, built of horns, has no demonstrable connexion with hunting; the horns were doubtless relics of many sacrifices, and were built up for a whim, like the pile of tripod at Dodona (Steph. s.v. Δοδώνη). Deer were sacrificed to Artemis, at the Elaphobelia, in Patrae (Paus. vii. 18. 12, Bekker, Anecd. i. 249), the hunter's firstfruit being made a custom. Skins of African buffaloes were hung in the temple of Heracles at Rome (Ath. v. 221 f).

and following the Greek custom, a party of elephant hunters in Egypt dedicated their catch; whilst Hadrian the Emperor dedicated in Thespiae the firstling of a bear hunt. In the Anthology, skin and antlers of a slain stag are offered to Artemis, or the horns hung on a tree for Pan. A hunter in chase of a wild bull, knocks off his horn with the hunting-cudgel, and hangs it upon a wild pear-tree. Two brothers dedicate stag’s heads to Apollo, hanging them in the porch of his temple. A lionskin and claws are hung on a pine tree for Pan, a wolfskin upon a plane, a boar is offered to him under a birch tree. Hunters’ dedications are found as late as the sixth century after Christ. Perhaps we may include here the elephant’s skull which Pausanias saw in a shrine of Artemis in Campania.

The fisherman also dedicates firstlings, and not to one god only. It seems to have been the custom for tunny-fishers after a good haul to offer the first tunny caught to Poseidon; but the eel-catchers of Copais offered their finest eels to “the gods,” by ancient prescription. These gods may be the nameless deities, or the Cabiri, or the Ptoan hero, or Apollo. In the Anthology we find the fisherman offering a crab to Pan as firstling of his catch; or a seasnail to the nymphs of the caves; or a parcel of fish, wrapt in seaweed, to Artemis.

to Cheiron, the Tyrians to Agenorides; the "first physicians," and their own patrons.

Besides the private celebrations of the countryside and the shore, there were public ceremonies by which the state sought to express gratitude and to avert dearth. The Hyperboreans used to send firstfruits and tithes in a mysterious fashion to Dodona and Delos. Eretrians and Magnetes paid firstfruits to Apollo as "giver of corn." At Athens the Eiresione was a sort of harvest home, at which bread and fruit, honey, oil, and wine were offered to the Sun and the Seasons, or to Athena Polias. The προηρόσια was similar, and so was the bunch of grapes offered to Dionysus at the Oschophoria. At the Panathenaeae, the eiresione was a branch plucked from the sacred olive groves, and offered to Athena. The Troezenians gave firstfruits to Poseidon; and firstfruits due to Apollo are mentioned at Decelea and at Delphi, in which latter place the "threshing-floor" had an important part in the religious ceremonies\(^1\). The cereals offered to Zeus and other deities in sacrifice, and possibly the sprinkling of barley meal, would appear to recall the ancient custom\(^2\). Aristotle says distinctively, that the ancient sacrifices, made after the harvesting, were a kind of firstfruits\(^3\). We see the old surviving into the new order of things, when the Eleans after their ancient custom sacrificed monthly on “all the altars” wheat kneaded with honey\(^4\). The custom of sacrificing cakes, and things without life, was ancient in Athens also\(^5\); and the traditional offering to Phigalean Demeter was fruit, honeycombs, and wool yet unspun\(^6\), while the fruits of autumn were offered to Demeter in Mycalessus\(^7\).

The word “firstfruits,” although it does not occur in Homer, is implied by the cognate verb which has a ritual meaning\(^8\), and Homer uses ἀργυματα in the sense of ἀπαρχαί\(^9\). The same form occurs in very old Attic inscriptions\(^10\). Homer recites also how Artemis sent the great boar to destroy the crops, because the usual offerings had not been made to her on the threshing floor\(^11\).

Herodotus, who first uses the noun ἄπαρχη, speaks of the firstfruits of his inheritance which Croesus sent to Delphi and elsewhere. Inscriptions mention the firstfruits of corn, of oil, of the fruits of the earth: those of fish and of house-property, in Delos, are probably a civil tax. Firstfruits of tribute money occur often in Attic inscriptions; and firstfruits of men were dedicated to the gods, originally perhaps for sacrifice, later for use as slaves. The word occurs on inscriptions of Rhodes, Miletus, Delos, and is very common in Athens as we shall see. ἀκροθίνον or ἄκροθίνα is used in a similar sense; for firstfruits in kind I have already given an instance, and it is applied to a statue dedicated by a poet or some such person in Phocis.

There is nothing to show whether the firstfruits formed any particular fraction of the whole, but the country custom would appear to have been that a sheaf or two was enough for the small farmer. Indeed, so long as there was no organised priesthood, there would be no reason to offer more than would make a good show. But with the organised priesthood, and with the organised social system, there must needs come a change. A fixed minimum would be appointed by the king or the representatives of the god, and exacted as a due. Moreover, with large amounts offerings in kind become inconvenient; and we can hardly doubt that as soon as a fixed currency was introduced, whether in tripods, axes, cauldrons, or what not, which each represented some unit of value in kind, the firstfruits would be commuted for their value. This is perhaps the origin of the tithe (δεκάτη); although since the two words are used for votive offerings side by side, as we shall see, the question is not yet clear. The principle of the firstfruits or tithe offering was extended, as civilisation increased, to merchants and tradesmen; and was applied also to the portion set apart by states for their patron deity, or for support of some national shrine. The tithe was also dedicated to the gods not only from yearly profits but from occasional gains, such as the spoils of war, and a windfall or lucky find. The same idea prompted the consecration of one-tenth of the land apportioned out for cleruchs' allotments, and one-tenth of confiscated property, which we shall discuss later.

The evidence for the extent of the tithe offering is not complete. The reason, however, is probably that the inscriptions so far discovered are unevenly distributed, whilst smaller towns would have a less organised cult. The earlier inscriptions, moreover, have often only the deity's name, often only his and the giver's, with or without a verb; and as we know that some dedications so inscribed were the firstfruits or the tithe of war, the fact that this is not specified elsewhere does not prove that it was not true. The Pelasgians offered the tithe, as the

1 Robertson Smith, Religion of the Semites, 245 ff., 458, discusses the tithe. The tithe appears to have gone to the kings, and the maintenance of the tribal sanctuaries to have been a first charge upon it. See also Trans- actions of the Victoria Institute, xxxi. 126. The fraction chosen depends on the fact that a man has ten fingers, and therefore ten is the natural basis of arithmetic. δεκάτη, like πεμπάτην, meant properly to 'count' (not as Suidas says s.v. δεκάτθαυ, derived from a marshalling of the recipients in tens). Later the word δεκάτη, like δεκατεύων, may have lost its exact sense, so as to be used for any sacred portion. Cp. IGI iii. 258 δεκάταν ὑπὲρ θυγατρῶν.

2 The tithe was a royal tax under Peisistratus: Arist. Ath. Pol. xvi.; and perhaps later, Xen. Hell. i. 1. 22, Pollux vi. 128, ix. 28.

3 Thuc. iii. 50 records this of the cleruchy in Lesbos. We have no further information on the subject, but he mentions it as a matter of course.

Hyperboreans did. There are ancient dedications of a tithe of war in many places; the tithe not specified is offered to Zeus at Thebes, to Demeter by men and women in Argolis, by a woman to Athena at Paestum, to Apollo by a man at Naxos. Statues on the Sacred Way at Branchidae are an early example of the dedication of the tithe to a non-local deity. In Athens we find the war tithe early, and a tithe of slaves is mentioned. A great number of other tithes have been found here, which we shall consider by and by. DedICATIONS from Calabria and Calymna are specified as a tithe of work. Later, we find the tithe in Anaphe, Boeotia, Crete, Cyrene, Delos, Didymi and Epidaurus in Argolis, Halicarnassus, Ithaca, Megara, Naxos, Rhodes, Thera. The tithe of trade is alluded to incidentally in a Cretan inscription of the third century. It is also used in connexion with feasts for the dead. The tithe is not mentioned in Homer.

At the great national sanctuaries, in which every Greek city was interested, each city which hoped for the favour of the presiding deity made offering occasional or regular⁷. Herodotus speaks of the tithe due to Apollo⁸ and Zeus⁹, and each deme appears to have been bound to pay its share⁴. The Athenian theori, who sailed to Delos in the sacred ship of Theseus, in memory of his vow to Apollo⁵, took the firstfruits with them⁶; and the same was done by other states⁷. Vases were dedicated as firstfruit by Cos⁸ and Rhodes⁹; and the Mapsidichae, perhaps an agricultural tribe, send their firstfruits year by year¹⁰. The same was the case at Delphi¹¹. The Eleusinian shrine was supported from early times by the firstfruits which had been enjoined by a Delphic oracle apparently upon all the Greeks¹², and were sent to Athens “from all parts.” During the fifth century, this pious custom fell into disuse; and just before the war, a law was past making it compulsory upon Athens and her allies, and inviting the other states to join in. Occasional offerings were sent for some special prosperity. Here the tithe or firstfruit assumes a developed form; it is a thanksgiving for that which gave wealth to the dedicating state. Thus Croesus sends to Delphi an offering of the gold which was found in his country. The Siphnians offer a tithe of their mines; the Corecyreans acknowledge a special haul of fish at Delphi and Olympia, and Tenedos makes similar acknowledgment apparently for a fine catch of crabs; Selinus renders thanks for its celery, Metapontium, Myrrhina, Apollonia for their corn, all at Delphi.

The Samian merchants tithed their profits to the amount of six talents; and with the money they procured a magnificent bronze crater supported on kneeling figures, which they dedicated in the Heraeum.

When we examine the private dedications of this class, we find a great variety of callings represented. Sometimes the nature of the offering alone shows that it is the tithe or firstfruit of husbandry, orchardry, shepherdy, or hunting; but in many cases the dedicator records his calling. Actor and physician offer a tithe of profits at Delphi. On the acropolis of Athens we find the fisherman, the breeder, and the farmer, before the Persian invasion; and a fisher apparently vows his first cast to the nymphs of Syra. Of course no special deity was necessary for the artisan to worship; but Athena in this aspect was often called Ergane, the Worker (Diod. v. 73, Paus. i. 24, 3), and coupled with Hephaestus (Solon xiii. 49, Paus. i. 14, 6, CIA ii. 114 b). There is no evidence or likelihood of a special type, cult, or temple of Ergane at Athens (ep. Farnell i. 344 f.). As Stathomia, she protected commerce, Hesych. s.v. The Burthen would be the season for such offerings, and the custom of dedicating them must have been common. Isaeus speaks of a generous man performing this duty for those who could not or would not; and the custom is attested by the inscriptions. Cleon then, is not gibing, when he says to the sausage-seller, "I'll denounce your sausages as confiscate to the gods; never a tithe have you paid on them." The tithe of profits, with reference to fishermen, is alluded to as a thing of course by Diphilus, but as being sometimes dishonoured in the breach.

Later, a cordwainer's guild dedicates a statue in Lesbos. As late as the Roman age a trade-dedication is found in Amphipolis.

If we may trust analogy, the firstfruit of a craftsman would be his first finish piece, the 'masterpiece' of the mediaeval workman; and some of the dedications appear to be of this kind. The most conclusive evidence is furnisht by a covered earthenware jar, found at Athens, and inscribed "Lycinus dedicated to Athena his first piece of work." "Firstfruit of work" is scratcht on a ficitile vase found on the Acropolis; and perhaps some of the famous vase-painters whose names also appear there, such as Andocides, Nearc̃h, and Euphronius, may have dedicated a choice piece of their own. The phrase "with his hands" inscribed on another block may be interpreted in the same way; the same by one reading may be said of one of the pottery tablets at Corinth. An Aeginetan artist made a statue for his deity. Another inscription, apparently from Corinth, records that Midonidas offered a piece which he had himself painted; and a similar formula is found at Athens. An Athenian vase bears the figure of the goddess armed, and upon the shield is the legend "Callis made and dedicated it to Athena Health." We may perhaps take as the workman's first attempt a rough obelisk of terra-cotta found at Metapontium, and dedicated by a potter to Heracles. A bronze statuette of a youth, ascribed to the fifth century, and dedicated to the goddess at Rhamnus, is a firstfruit. Euphronius's offering from Melos was made by himself; it may have been the column, or a statue upon it. iron group of Hercules and the Hydra at Delphi, and iron heads of lion and wild boar to Dionysus at Pergamus, all which he had made himself and were "marvels of skill." Perhaps the "beautiful partridge" of Protogenes, dedicated at Rhodes, was offered with the like feeling. The wording of an ancient inscription on the steps of the old temple at Syracuse suggests a maker's dedication. Of the same kind will be the two amphorae dedicated at Erythrae, by a master and pupil, who held a contest to see which could make the thinner. Palamedes is said to have dedicated in the shrine of Fortune at Corinth the dice which he had invented. Parmenion a painter painted a pig so naturally that those who saw it expected a grunt; and this he dedicated.

The outline which traditionally suggested to Butades of Sicyon the moulding of portraits in clay, was preserved in the Nymphaeum. Eubulides of Athens, too, made and dedicated a statue of Apollo. Two sacrificial vessels are made and dedicated to Pan and the Nymphs by the same man. It is on this principle I would explain the bronze Apollo, with an inscription in silver letters declaring that Charidamus dedicates it as a tithe to Athena. There is no meaning in dedicating the statue of one god to another, except it be dedicated as a work of art or a thing of value. It can hardly have been dedicated by this man, as a tithe of war. Perhaps too the curious cast bronzes, found in the Idaean cave of Crete, are the maker’s masterpiece. I suggest this because they include two or three scenes cast in one piece: a war-galley manned, a man milking a cow, and other incongruous scenes together. Each scene has its own base, so they were meant to be separated; but there seems no reason why they should be dedicated together unless as specimens of the maker’s art.

A somewhat fanciful extension of this idea suggests to the literary man the dedication of some of his work. Plato is using metaphor, no doubt, when he speaks of the mottoes at Delphi as the “firstfruits of wisdom” dedicated by Solon and other wise men; and Pindar, when he uses the dedicatory verb of his odes; but Heraclitus dedicated his book in the temple at Ephesus. The poems of Hesiod appear to have been dedicated on Mount Helicon, where Pausanias saw them engraved on ancient tablets of lead. At Delos were the poems of Alcaeus and the astronomy of Eudoxus, and at Lindus the Seventh Olympian of Pindar. A “golden book” was dedicated at Delphi by the poetess Aristomachace, who had won a prize at the Isthmia. The custom was not confined to Greece; for the Carthaginian traveller Hanno dedicated his log-book in the temple of Baal at Carthage. Oenopides of Chios dedicated an astronomical table of bronze at Olympia;

In later days we find prize poems so treated. Paeans to Apollo have been unearthed in the Treasury of the Athenians at Delphi\(^2\), and a hymn to Dionysus in the same sanctuary\(^3\); all these of the fourth century. Such another is Thrasyllus' hymn to Apollo Maleatas and Asclepius, found at Epidaurus\(^4\). At Delphi also have been found two inscriptions in shorthand, and references to a work of Aristotle\(^5\). So we see Agathias dedicating his book to Paphia\(^6\). Perhaps the alphabet inscribed on a piece of pottery, and dedicated to Poseidon at Corinth, may represent a learner's first

The offering in kind was often commemorated by a model. There is no reason to think that the models took the place of the tithe or firstfruit; it is rather to be supposed that they accompanied the offering, and were meant to keep it in mind. Thus we find three cities sending “golden harvestings” or sheaves to Delphi3; and eleven ears of corn, silver gilt, were among the Parthenon treasures in the fifth century4. At a later date other gilt corn-ears are mentioned here, standing upon a little pillar5. For a similar reason, doubtless, Selinus sent a golden head of celery6. A golden olive appears at Oropus7; golden vine-clusters at Delos8 and at the shrine of the Cabiri near Thebes9; at Delos was also a golden seallavender10. The Ampeliotis, a Libyan tribe, sent to Delphi a head of the precious silphium; an offering small indeed, and perishable too, if it were not a model11. All these are mentioned by the way, but they were certainly not alone: Pliny adds a golden radish, a silver beet, and a turnip of lead12, private offerings no doubt.

Many of the animals mentioned in the Inventories, or found in excavations, may have had a similar origin. Some may have been dedicated as ornaments or trinkets; and yet it is not unlikely that the Athenian silver duck was a poulterer’s offering 1, or that the goats and rams given at Delos by Parmenion and Timoxenus were firstlings in model2. At the Argive Heraeum were found the duck, the cock, the sheep, and the cow3. Oxen, sheep, pigs and suchlike found amongst the ruins of a temple may be memorials of sacrifice4; but it is difficult so to regard the riderless horse and the mare. I may mention, then, that models of horses were dedicated in the ancient shrine of Menelaus5, at Calaurea6, Taenarum7, Delos8, at Dodona9, at Olympia10, in Crete11, and in the Heraeum12, most ancient of all. Bulls, rams, stallions and brood-mares will come under a different category13, although it is possible that some of these were model firstlings.

The fruit or offering in kind which is sometimes seen in the hands or upon the knees of votive statuettes may represent the firstfruit or tithe.

There is direct evidence for the hunter’s dedication of a model of his prey. Hesychius tells how a Samian hunter made such an offering to Hera in his native isle14. Another example will be the bronze hare dedicated to Apollo at Priene15. Cakes in the form of deer were offered to Artemis at Patrae at the feast of Elaphebolia. As late as the sixth century after Christ a hunter in Egypt places a model of his antelope on a pillar, and dedicates it to Isis, with an inscription which he proudly claims to have carved with his own hand. Others are perhaps the deer of silver or gold mentioned in the Delian inventories. Many other animals are named in the lists which may have a similar origin, though it is impossible to say that they were not toys or ornaments: at Delos were two silver beasts in a wooden cage, at Athens a basket with ivory beasts in it. There was a bronze bison's head at Delphi, dedicated by a Paeonian chief. It is difficult to doubt that models of beasts of prey or the chase were often, if not generally, the hunter's gift. For such groups as the bull attacked by a lion, found at the Heraeum, and the stag brought down by hounds, two at least of which kind were found at Olympia, the explanation is practically certain; and it is likely for the figures of lions, bears, stags, hares and rabbits which have been unearthed at Olympia, at the shrine of Menelaus, at the Cabirium, at Calaurea, at Athens, at Naucratis. From the Argive Heraeum come the stag, the wild goat, and wild birds with long beaks, in pairs or singly: these last belong to the stage of geometric decoration. Heads of lions, eagles and other creatures were probably ornamental.

The workman or artist might dedicate a picture or model of his work, when the work itself was not suitable for the purpose. Mandrocles, who built Darius's bridge over the Bosporus, spent part of the fee in a picture of the bridge, which he dedicated to Hera in Samos for a firstfruit. A shoemaker dedicated a stone relief of a shoe to an Athenian hero. I have met with no other certain example of the kind, but perhaps the models of the temple at Delos, preserved amongst its treasures, and the wooden pattern of the tiles, were dedicated by the master mason.

It is a pretty thought which suggests the dedication of the workman's tools, after a successful job, or when they or the owner are past work. I have found no direct evidence for this in the classical age; but both legend and history prove that it was in accord with Greek ways of thought. The Argo was dedicated to Poseidon after its famous voyage. Meleager, it is said, dedicated in Corinth the spear with which he slew the great boar; and a story of Cimon from the year 480 implies the same idea. When the Athenians, we read, were hurrying out of the city to take refuge in Salamis, "Cimon was the first man that went with a life and jollity into the castle, carrying a bit of a bridle in his hand to consecrate unto the goddess Minerva: signifying thereby, that that had no need of horsemen at that time, but of mariners and seamen. Eighty years later, it is on record that Xenophon's men, their long march over, consecrated their staves upon a cairn which they there built where first they had caught sight of the sea. These indications are too scanty to decide how far the customs recorded in later poems of the Anthology are true of earlier times; but in these all sorts and conditions of men seem to conform to them. The hunter hangs club and dog-collar on a plane tree in honour of Pan, or dedicates a spear to Pan and the Nymphs. When he wants a rest, he entrusts his bow and arrows to Artemis "during the truce"; when he is too old to work, he leaves his gear to Pan. Traps and snares are dedicated to Hermes. The fisherman dedicates rods, nets, and creels, trident and other tackle, his very boat, to Poseidon. The carpenter retiring from business offers to Pallas saw and axe, plane, auger, and footrule. The goldsmith, gone blind with age, gives over to Hermes the file, tongs, and blowpipe of his calling. A plowman dedicates his plow and all his gardening tools to Deo. The lucky delver, on finding a treasure in the earth, offers to Athena his rake, shovel, pick, and axe. So Lucian's Timon, when he accepts the offers of Plutus, exclaims: "O my spade, and beloved leather jerkin, now it were well to dedicate you to Pan." The harpist dedicates his lyre to Phoebus. Spinther the cook, on leaving service, places in the shrine of Hermes his pots and pans, pestle and mortar, chopper and ladle, fan, flesh-fork and sponge, and the key of the pig-sty. The grim pedagogue superannuated remembers Hermes, and hands over his cane and tawse and skullcap. Ascondas the writer, appointed tax-collector, gives his writing materials to the Muses. The working woman, her task at length done, consecrates to Athena shuttle and spindle, bobbins and basket. The same thing is seen where a person changes his manner of living. Nicarete turns music girl, and dedicates her bobbins and quiddities to Aphrodite. Bitto offers her κερείς to Athena, having found at the age of thirty that more profitable is the cult of Aphrodite. Courtesans on the same principle make free to dedicate their mirrors or other articles of ornament and dress to Aphrodite. The occasion is not always stated; but it is now a lawful marriage, or again when old age has robbed the woman of her beauty, and her day is past. On the last occasion, one offers a bronze mirror, sandals, girdle, ringlets, and other symbols. When Alexis the eunuch sickens of effeminate revelry, he leaves his cymbals and other gear in the shrine. Cleitosthenes too can no longer use his musical instruments, so to Cybele fall the tambours and cymbals, the flutes and the knife. A eunuch dying of excesses gives to Priapus his muslins and false hair, his box and his pipes. After the orgies, Porphyris of Cnidus gives garlands, thyrsi, and anklet to Dionysus. Many of these epigrams are only half serious, and we are now prepared to find the poet playing with the idea. The effect is pretty enough when the labouring ox, outworn with toil, is dedicated in his old age to peace and rest; but one Xenophon, after making a night of it, is frankly impious:

Bibbing Bob to Bacchus brings
These his pious offerings, Empty bottle, empty pot—
All that Bibbing Bob has got.

The inscriptions furnish hardly anything to bear out this custom. A hunter dedicates his club in a late inscription; and in Athens we find a spool of thread dedicated by a woman, whilst another apparently offers a basket of soft wool, both perhaps given (though this is only a guess) in memory of their part in weaving the peplus. Wool is also dedicated by a woman at Plataea, why or to what deity is not known. It is not unlikely that the loom-weights and similar objects found in great numbers under the soil of ancient sanctuaries, were dedicated by work-people; two or three such loom-weights are inscribed with a woman’s name. Physicians at least seem to have consecrated their tools. Even if the καθετήρες of Athens and Delos were not such (the word may mean a necklace), Medon certainly dedicated his probes; and for a later date the practice is proved by a relief in stone of a whole case of surgical instruments. A leaden quiver is inscribed, “These saved us from starving.” We meet with no other tools in the Inventories which may be confidently placed in this class; but there is a fair probability for the iron anchors and the four metal ox-goads at Delos, and the cow-bell dedicated to the Cabiri. There are, however, a great many picks and mallets, fleshhooks, scrapers and choppers, and articles of female use and ornament, some of which were votive offerings and all may have been so. It would be rash indeed to assume that every axe was dedicated by a retiring butcher, or a mirror by some lesser Lais or Rhodopis; but with this caution, we may briefly review the remains. A mirror found at Dodona was dedicated by a woman Polyxena. Most of the objects are inclined to explain as the largest multiple of the mint. I suggest, but with diffidence, that the same principle may explain a curious entry of twenty-one golden letters in the list of the Chalcothece at Athens. Could this be the old Athenian alphabet, dedicated when Euclides changed the official script in 403? The dedication of an alphabet would not be unexampled, if Newton was right in regarding one found at the temple of Apollo in Calymna as votive; and an alphabet is painted on one of the Corinthian tablets dedicated to Poseidon.

For iron currency of this sort see Ridgeway, Origin of Coin and Weight Standards, 214 ff. The iron βουτάλινα ὀβελίσκος which Rhodopis sent to Delphi as a tithe were perhaps an early currency (Herod. ii. 135). Plutarch calls them 'obelisks': De Pyth. Or. 14. The word meant originally a long straight spit. What was the iron currency of Sparta?

It is a step further in artistic expression, when the devotee attempts to express by his offering the act or process which the deity has blest to his prosperity. The evidence is scanty, but quite clear. Nothing else can be meant (for a portrait-model is out of the question) by the model of a stone-ram dedicated on the Athenian Acropolis, with an inscription which admits of no mistake. We may therefore interpret in the same way the bronze ram inscribed to Apollo Maleatas, and the rams found or recorded at Delos, Dodona, Lycosura, Olympia, and Naucratis. A group such as the brood-mare sucking a foal, again, several of which were found at Athens and at Olympia, can hardly be mistaken; or the stag brought down by hounds, also found at Olympia; or the man milking a cow, from Crete. This is the most likely interpretation of a silhouette plate found near Apollo's temple at Metapontium, and the Athenian or Olympian boar. The sire, or the dam with young, thus embodies as it were and sums up the breeder's work. A horse carrying two jars, found in Cyprus, suggests traffic in oil; one laden with loaves or fruit in baskets may also have been dedicated to Cabirus by a trader. Groups like the milch-cow in milking and the stag at bay represent the dedicator's work more fully; and a similar thought may have caused the dedication of a cart drawn by oxen, found in the Dictaean cave. The hunter's dog was sometimes dedicated in effigy, as a late Lesbian inscription testifies, and a poem of the Anthology offers a "stone dog instead of a real one." These may explain the model hounds of Lusi in Arcadia and the Cabirium, and the model hawks of Naucratis.

1 AJA iv. 28 ff., figured. Mr Emerson, the editor, suggests this explanation as a guess, along with a symbolical interpretation which is quite untenable. The district was noted for agriculture and breeding, as the corn and bull devices on coins of Metapontium and Thurii go to show.

10 Naucratis, i. 14. I do not forget the connexion of hawks with Egyptian worship, but there is no reason to separate them from the other animals. Why should the sacred Egyptian bird be dedicated to a Greek deity? The assumption cannot be accepted without evidence. See also chap. xiv.
Perhaps the golden anvil of Delos\(^1\) was another attempt in the same direction. In later days, at least, such models were common. Philostratus describes how in the temple of Dionysus on Mount Nysa, were "sickles, pruning knives, and wine-presses, and all things belonging thereunto, made of gold and silver, and dedicated to Bacchus, as to one concerned in the vintage\(^2\)."

It is fitting also to mention the "foundation deposit" of the temple at Naucratis, which consisted of model knives and axes, hoes, rakes, adzes, chisels, trowels, with libation bowls and other such things; models of a mud brick and a glazed brick, ingots of gold, silver, copper, iron, lead, and pieces of precious stone: all the tools and materials used in the building\(^3\).

The same explanation must be given of figures representing the worshipper in some characteristic attitude. There is very little evidence for this in early times. At the Argive Heraeum was found the figure of a man cooking or something of the sort\(^4\); in Cyprus, a baker kneading bread\(^5\). From Dodona comes a youth clad in hide or frieze clore, and carrying a hunting club\(^6\). At Naucratis was found a hunter's figure carrying game, and inscribed to Aphrodite\(^7\). Perhaps the "statue with a hare," which is recorded in the Athenian list of bronzes on the Acropolis, may have been dedicated by a hunter\(^8\). One statuette was found at Paestum, which I cannot explain otherwise, although I do not suggest the present explanation with any confidence. It represents a woman, draped but without distinguishing attributes, one hand raised to support a basket or some other article which has disappeared. The figure stood on a small pillar, and was dedicated by Phillo to Athena as a tithe\(^9\). It is impossible to suppose, as Curtius does\(^1\), that a temple official dedicates a tithe of her pay, without evidence of such pay, and without authority for such a custom. The word tithe had its proper meaning at this date, and therefore the figure cannot be the memorial of an honourable place in the ritual, the representation that is of a canephorus in some procession. It is conceivable that the figure represented a working woman or huxter ready to trade; and I can think of nothing else. An equally puzzling object is the well-known marble disc bearing the portrait of Aeneus the physician, inscribed as a “memorial of his skill\(^2\).” Style and script suit the latter part of the sixth century; and the Aeneus mentioned is probably a physician of Cos, uncle of the great Hippocrates\(^3\). Where it came from is not known; but it cannot be sepulchral\(^4\). It may conceivably have adorned some physician’s hall; if it be votive\(^5\), it differs in formula from all others I have met with, and is the unique example of a votive portrait at so early a date\(^6\). Even so, however, it will be more than a portrait, and falls in here with the rest. It is at least probable, then, that a successful huntsman, artist, craftsman, trader would dedicate a figure, in character, as a thank-offering for success in his calling. Further, we have Aristotle’s evidence for such a dedication as a thank-offering for good fortune. There was to be seen on the acropolis, he says, the “ancient statue” of a youth standing beside a horse, the figure (not necessarily a portrait, of course; but an image not divine) of one who by some lucky chance rose from the lowest class into that of the Knights\(^1\). The ancient fragment of a led horse which is among the votive offerings found there may belong to a similar monument\(^2\).

In a picture, of course, the craft or calling can be more clearly represented; and it is certain that the practice of dedicating terra-cotta tablets was common. Its prevalence cannot be measured by the few which survive, because articles like these, of no intrinsic value, were sure to be destroyed; and those actually found appear to be the refuse of the sanctuary of Poseidon. But it so happens that a large deposit of them has been found at Corinth, and these of a high antiquity\(^3\). Corinth was famed for its potteries in the old days, and Corinthian vases were largely exported to Italy; amongst the tablets are a large number which refer to the potter's craft; others relate to hunting or to agriculture, others to war or the games. This single find is enough to show that votive offerings of all sorts were made to the patron deity of a city, irrespective of his later traditional character. Some of the sherds are painted on both sides, and therefore must have been meant to hang free, not against a wall. A large number represent Poseidon, with or without Amphitrite, sometimes with other figures such as Athena\(^4\) or Homeric heroes\(^5\); besides the votive inscription, the names are often inscribed, and in one case the furnace\(^6\). With two possible exceptions, the occasion is never mentioned, nor any word said in elucidation of it, but prayers are found\(^7\). The figures of oxen are common, and in one case they appear to gives it the finishing touches. The stoker pokes up the furnace, the vessels are stackt within it and burnt, out they come and are hung up in the shop, and finally the ship sets sail with the articles strung in a row on the rigging. The voyage safely accomplisht, comes back the merchant from Italy or "from Peiraeus;" and pays his offering with a prayer for future blessings, accompanied with adoration and solemn sacrifice.

An Athenian vase-painting of the fifth century shows a scene which has been interpreted as a tradesman's thanksgiving. The worshipper, a bearded man with a garland upon his head, approaches a blazing altar. On the twigs of an olive tree hang three tablets, perhaps (like those of Corinth) depicting his trade; a statuette which he has dedicated stands on a slim pillar; to the right is Athena in the form of the armed Parthenos. Whether the reliefs, which came into fashion in the fifth and especially the fourth century, ever represented the tradesman’s craft, the remains are too scanty to show. One tithe dedication of an early date is affixed to the remains of a relief, but there is too little left to determine its character. Those which can be made out are mostly sacrificial, that is they represent and commemorate an act of cult. If the tithe were habitually offered at the Chalcees the relief might depict the ceremony at that feast. One relief, inscribed to the goddess, shows her standing with an altar upon her left hand, and behind a votive pillar with a sunk panel in it, and a fragment of a similar relief shows the worshipper, a woman in this case.

Reliefs to Zeus Meilichios, which show worshippers in the presence of the deity enthroned, have been found at Athens; and since this deity is connected with agriculture, they may be placed here. The Good Spirit has the same pose and aspect

We are but little better off with Artemis. Since the goddess is typically represented in huntress garb, we cannot read any reference to the occasion into such representations of her; they were the natural offering in a shrine where she was worshiped, if the worshipper desired to offer an image\(^3\). Nor can we interpret so common a motive as holding a flower to the nose, to imply that she was here regarded as goddess of vegetation\(^4\). But sometimes a hunting scene is suggested; and it is not too fanciful to interpret as the hunter’s thank-offering an Athenian relief which shows a naked figure, apparently in the act of shooting his arrow, with a dog, Artemis appearing in the background among rocks\(^5\). So too where the goddess is striking the animal with arrow\(^1\) or spear\(^2\), especially if a male worshipper is also seen\(^1\). In these the deity is conceived as herself carrying out the process which she has blest. Perhaps the Macedonian relief to Fruitful Demeter is a farmer’s offering\(^3\). Perhaps also a relief, dedicated to the river-god Hermes, is a fisherman’s; on a couch a male figure reclines, holding a fish and a vase\(^4\).

One class of relief has so obvious a reference to the celebrations of country life and the worship of the rural deities, that we may fairly bring it into connexion with the tithe and firstfruit.

These represent as a rule Pan and the Nymphs, sometimes associated with other deities. The songs and dances which accompanied their festivals have been already described. The scene is a rough cavern, in which is an altar; within the cavern, the nymphs are seen dancing, clad in flowing robes which sometimes shroud the head also. The number is usually three; they hold by each other’s girdles, or some part of the dress. Occasionally Pan, or at times Hermes\(^5\), is in the cave; otherwise Pan sits in a corner, playing for them upon the pipes. The head of a river-god is usually visible to one side, and there are sometimes small figures of worshippers in the attitude of adoration. Apollo as god of the herds is sometimes found in the same connexion. The grotto at Vari was dedicated to Apollo, Pan, and the Nymphs in common\(^6\); and the two deities were neighbours under the Acropolis rock, where they were worshipped far into the Roman age\(^7\).

Such names as Auxo, Carpo, Thaleo, Pandrosos, Agraulos, point without doubt to natural personifications; and for our purpose it is immaterial what they be called. It is very doubtful whether there were many dedications to the Graces. The authorities speak of one famous example, made by Socrates: Schol. Arist. Clouds 773, Paus. ix. 38. 5.

The oldest relief of this class comes from Thasos, which, though not votive, is interesting from its scheme. Apollo, lyre in hand, stands on one side of a door or the opening of a cave; a female figure crowns him. On the other side of the door are Hermes and three nymphs. Of the typical scene in the cave there are many examples. In one variation, Pan plays on the pipe to three dancing nymphs, one of whom carries ears of corn in her hands. Another shows the head of the river-god on one side. A third, found in the grotto on Parnes, has Pan seated aloft, with goats' heads indicated on the edge of the carving; within the cave, Hermes leads the nymphs in their dance, and as before the river-god's head is visible. A fourth, this from Megara, adds the figures of four worshippers. Yet another variant is seen in the Archandrus relief. Here Pan appears to be peeping out of his grotto upon the dance, whilst a worshipper gazes over the altar at the nymphs, who this time are standing still. The figure of the dedicater seems intended to be a portrait. A slab found in Rome, but of Greek workmanship, shows this scene with all its meaning refined out of it. There is no cave, no Pan, but Hermes leads three very quiet nymphs towards a worshipper, and from behind a river-god looks benevolently on.

Three curious reliefs show a pair of Pans in the grotto. In one the Pans carry each a goad, while the nymphs dance above. In another, of later date, the Pans have crescent horns. The popular belief in a plurality of Pans, which was fostered by the derivation of the name from πᾶς, has been already mentioned. The dedication of this piece to Cybele reminds us that Cybele and the nymphs are associated as early as Pindar. They are joined in a Tanagran relief, and in the deme Phlya they were worshipt together, as in the grotto of Archedemus at Vari. A sacrificial relief to Μήτηρ Νομαία must belong to this class. But the mass of Cybele dedications have no obvious reference to rustic celebrations. The female deity, with calathus on head, in another relief (4th century) may perhaps be Demeter; a female idol, holding two torches, meant perhaps for Hecate, is present, and a smaller male figure holds a libation-jug. Another relief, even more puzzling, was found near Phalerum. The slab is carved on both sides: one representing Echelus and Basile, two local heroes, in a four-horse car; in the other, the three nymphs appear with a river-god, and the other figures are a youth and a bearded man who face one another. A rude piece from the bed of the Ilissus appears to be dedicated to the Naiads; another shows Achelous, Hermes, and Heracles, the last two pouring libations to a seated god, perhaps Zeus Meilichios. An interesting memorial of nymph-worship is an Athenian relief, recording a dedication of a dozen washermen and washerwomen. Two scenes are represented, a space being left between for the inscription. The upper scene is a grotto of the familiar type; to the left is the head of the Achelous, towards which advances Hermes leading three nymphs; in the right Pan squats on his haunches playing upon the pipes. The lower scene represents Demeter and the Maid, facing an altar, towards which advances a bearded man leading a horse. The stature of the man shows that he is not human, and his horse also suggests that we have here some local hero. That washermen should worship the nymphs down by the Ilissus, who sent them water to ply their trade, is as natural as it is for the farmer and the huntsman to thank them for their winnings.

Dedications are often made to the nymphs alone. The earliest dates from the early sixth century. One which is assigned to the fifth century is fragmentary, but appears to have contained the nymphs only. So we find a dedication of the fourth century to them alone. The groups of three dancing figures, called by some the Graces, would appear to belong to this class; and if so, they show an earlier form of the votive tablet than the cave of Pan. In a piece from Naples, a female worshipper joins hands with six others of larger size, doubtless Nymphs and Graces together.

century after Christ, may be here mentioned, although they show a debased feeling\(^1\). Four types are represented. In one (1) the three figures are nude, and stand in a cave, entwined in the attitude of the familiar group of the Graces; or they dance and wave a veil or a wrap. In another (2) they stand draped in various attitudes. A third (3) adds the figure of a priest placing incense on an altar; and a fourth (4) adds Zeus and Hera in large size, the nymphs being small. A horseman also appears. The ritual dance and sacrifice here reappear, but the representation has become artificial. In the last type, the nymphs are subordinated to Zeus and Hera; in the early examples, they are always the most important figures. We do find, however, other deities united with them. Cybele, Demeter and the Maid we have seen already\(^2\); Dionysus and Pan are found on another piece\(^3\); in the second century, Men appears by Pan’s side in a grotto\(^4\); but the most explicit rendering of the idea that Pan is All Gods has yet to be mentioned\(^5\). Here a table stands in the grotto, and the river-god’s head is upon it. On either side is a group of deities, seven in all; Zeus enthroned holds the centre, and amongst other figures which cannot be identified, we see the Maid holding two torches, and a male figure holding the horn of plenty. The three dancing nymphs are a subsidiary motive in a late relief dedicated to Isis, in which the central figure is a reclining male person, perhaps Achelous\(^6\).

Again, the tithe often took the form of a statue of the friendly deity. An example in point comes from legendary times. Ulysses, we are told, being of a mind to breed horses, dedicated an image of Horse Poseidon in Pheneus\(^7\). Bathycles of Magnesia, who made the gold-ivory Apollo at Amyclae, his work done, dedicated statues of his patron deity Artemis and the Graces\(^8\). Statues appear to have been dedicated in Olympia for

In Athens, before the battle of Salamis, Phrygia the baxter dedicated a bronze statuette of Athena armed, whose shield remains still\(^2\); other such figures remain, one being inscribed as a tithe\(^3\). The word used on other Athenian tithe and firstfruit dedications is that specially applied to divine figures at this date\(^4\). The statue is even inscribed as a "maiden"; that is, the image of Athena herself, otherwise the offering would have no point. When further we find that a private person, and he a man, dedicates as a firstfruit\(^5\) or tithe\(^6\) a statue of the same type as the famous Maidens of the Acropolis, and the same type is seen on reliefs to be meant for the goddess\(^7\), a new light is thrown on these mysterious statues. Other columns of the same shape as those which bear these inscriptions, and inscribed as the tithe or firstfruit, may well have borne similar statues\(^8\), and they were so common that Euripides uses them for a simile\(^9\). Thus some of them were demonstrably the tithe or firstfruit thank-offering of a tradesman or artisan\(^10\); and they may all have been such, or at least we may say that all were intended to represent the goddess and to be thankofferings of some sort. Isaeus seems to allude to these divine figures, when he speaks of the custom of dedicating firstfruits of one’s substance. The type is the simplest possible conception of an anthropomorphic goddess, without attributes.

In this light we may interpret a similar series of Maidens found at Delos, although there we have not the help of inscriptions;
the remains of other such elsewhere; the series of so-called Apollos, which in their nakedness may often represent other gods; and the figures of Zeus or other gods without attributes.
Indeed, as Phrygia’s armed Athena proves, any figure of a deity may have been dedicated on some such occasion as these.

A few allegorical offerings may be mentioned. There was one at Delphi, attributed to the great Hippocrates; a moulder-
skelton. The people of Corcyra, who had been guided to a great haul of fish by the bellowing of a bull, dedicated an image of this animal at Olympia and another at Delphi.
Aelian’s account of the golden sheep of Mandrobulus was that the lost treasure of the temple had been found by a sheep. There was a group of Earth praying for rain on the Acropolis at Athens.

So far the offerings have been more or less of an ideal type;
their value depending wholly or in part upon their meaning.
But here as elsewhere the offering may be given for its intrinsic value, and have no reference to the occasion at all. A man of Boeotia offers a sum of money, apparently in gratitude for a legacy. A shrine or other building might commemorate exceptional profits or a lucky windfall. According to the legend, Danaus founded a shrine of Apollo Lycius in Argos, having got the kingdom after seeing the omen of a wolf killing a bull. The Siphnians built their treasury at Delphi on the first discovery of their gold mines.

The tithe might be paid in money or valuables bought with money. A silver ingot found in Sicily, and dedicated to Zeus, from the names of the dedicators has been ascribed to a similar origin. In the Inventories we find such entries; as Andron offered so many gold pieces as firstfruit. The courtesan Rhodopis sent a tithe of her earnings to Delphi in the form of iron bars or goads, which I have already suggested may have been used for barter. Offerings from Corcyra and Tenedos are more than once said to have been axes, which were another ancient unit of currency. Axes of similar shape have been found in the Dictaean cave of Crete, at Dodona, in the temple of Artemis at Lusi (Arcadia). A bronze axe found in Calabria is dedicated to Hera by a butcher as tithe of his business.

It is natural of course that when axes were no longer current as money the sight of them should have suggested the proverb.

But the most numerous dedications are vases and vessels of one kind or another\(^1\) dedicated in the Acropolis. One appears to have been a marble sprinkling-bowl, a firstfruit\(^2\), and a similar article, given by a washerwoman, is inscribed as a tithe\(^3\). A fuller dedicates a bronze vase, of which fragments remain\(^4\); another is a bronze patena\(^5\).

Articles made of gold or of silver were also dedicated as trade-offerings, like the bowl of Dazos\(^6\) or the silver tithe-saucer of Proxenus, in the Delian inventory\(^7\); and it is impossible to say how many of the innumerable bowls which are mentioned have the same origin. Bowls are among the offerings made by huntsmen to Pan\(^8\), or by fishermen as a tithe to Priapus\(^9\). Two bowls, dedicated to Pedio, suggest a connexion with agriculture\(^10\). There are two little pots of gold offered at Delos by Cleino, a courtesan of the time of Ptolemy Philadelphus II.\(^11\)

Pieces of several fictile vases were found in the Acropolis, inscribed as votive offerings, one at least with the tithe specified\(^12\). Vases are dedicated to Pan and the Nymphs\(^13\). In the Anthology, Eurydice learning to read in her old age, dedicates a crown to the Muses\(^14\).

WAR.

And the Lord discomfited Sisera, and all his chariots, and all his host, with the edge of the sword before Barak.

Judges iv. 15.

The Greek army went into battle after solemn libation and sacrifice, singing paeans to invoke the protection of the gods; and victory was celebrated by thanksgivings. We need feel no surprise that the prayer for protection was often accompanied by a vow, and that victory was regularly followed by an offering. Indeed, inasmuch as war was the natural state of humanity in the early ages, the records of these vows and offerings form a very full series, beginning in prehistoric times and running on to the end of Greek history.

The Greeks had, however, no single and exclusive God of Battles. We are accustomed to think of Ares as such, and it is true that as early as Homer he is supposed to inspire combatants, even the very weapons they used. He is fierce and furious, he laps man’s blood, he is armed in panoply capapie: the personification of the lust of battle, one would call him invincible, it would seem that he alone should be prayed to by this side or that, yet the truth is far otherwise. Ares is on the side of Troy, yet Troy is taken; the very god of war is himself beaten in the fray. Athene causes him bitter pangs\(^1\); and with her aid, the mortal Diomedes wounds him, and makes him roar as loud as ten thousand men\(^2\). If Ares or Enyalios is sometimes invoked by the fighter\(^3\), yet the paean belongs specially to Apollo, and no less powerful on the battlefield are Zeus the Saviour\(^4\), or Zeus of the Rout\(^5\), Athena, Poseidon\(^6\), Aphrodite\(^7\), or even the demigod Heracles\(^4\). Later, no doubt, some deities had special prestige in this matter, as in the Middle Ages St Peter or our Lady of Walsingham had in danger of shipwreck\(^8\); but the natural instinct of each tribe or each person would be, to call upon that deity who was likely to be most favourable to him in particular. This god was god of the hills, and that of the valleys\(^9\); and Ares was the local god of Thrace. The people of Selinus are most impartial, and ascribe their victories to Zeus, Fear, and Heracles, to Apollo, to Poseidon and the Tyndaridae, Athena and Demeter guardian of flocks, to Pasicrateia and all the other gods, but most to Zeus\(^10\). So when the strife was won, the victorious host would testify their gratitude by some offering to their own deity, in the chief shrine of their own city\(^11\), or in a national sanctuary like Delphi or Olympia. Thus it is we find offerings in these national shrines made by any of the various states of Greece, and mortal enemies there meet in friendship or truce at least; whilst war spoils are found on the Acropolis of Athens dedicated to the maiden Athena, and in Samos to Hera, otherwise the goddess of peaceful wedded life. The attitude of the Greek to his patron deity is clear, when we remember that he is the Champion of his city; and so Athena, and even Aphrodite, appears in full armour. Solon's temple is the only historical dedication connected with war, made to Ares, until we come to the later poets of the Anthology. It is not for nothing, then, that the gods of the Homeric pantheon take sides: the Greek always thought of his gods as taking sides, and his prayers were guided accordingly.

What vow should be made before the battle, or what offering after, depended of course on circumstances: the importance of the issue, the wealth or number of the combatants, and so forth. It did happen once or twice that a leader, confident in his cause and his own right arm, paid the vow before the battle was fought; but on most of these occasions the deity seems to have mistaken his faith for presumption, and allowed him to be defeated. Legend tells how Polyneices and his Argive allies set up statues of Ares and Aphrodite before their disastrous expedition. As a rule, this kind of faith did not appeal to the Greek; he waited to let the god fulfil his part of the bargain first. In some cases, however, the deity does not seem to have been displeased by an act of bravado. Aristomenes, the hero of the second Messenian War, struck terror into the Spartans by entering their city by night, and hanging up a shield in the Brazen House of Athena, inscribed with the words—"Aristomenes from the spoils of the Spartans." Afterwards, like King Rameses at Lachish, he is said to have routed a body of Lacedaemonians all by himself. The hero's shield was turned to account before the battle of Leuctra. Before the battle the Thebans had sent to inquire at various oracles, amongst others of Trophonius, who returned them answer that they should set up a trophy and adorn it with this shield. Epameinondas gave orders accordingly, and the trophy was set up by Xenocrates with the shield upon it, in a place where it could be seen of the Lacedaemonians. They knew it, and perhaps recalled the old precedent; at all events, the oracle was justified of his words. The statue of Xenocrates was afterwards set up at Thebes. Themistocles, again, founded a temple before the battle of Salamis. So, too, Thrasybulus and his men, on setting out from Thebes to return to Athens, dedicated statues of Athena and Heracles in the Theban Heracleum.

It is usual to distinguish those offerings which the commander made on behalf of his army, or those made by the state, as public, from the private offerings whether of the commander made on his own behalf or of his men. The distinction is merely formal, not one of principle, and as it serves no useful purpose I have neglected it here. The offerings themselves may be broadly classified as follows:

I. Spoils: the arms of the vanquished, or their treasure.
II. The Victor's Arms or dress.
III. Other Commemorative offerings.

I. Spoils. No doubt if the Greek gods had so ordained, the people would not have questioned their right wholly to dispose of the property of a conquered race, as was commanded in the matter of Amalek by the mouth of the prophet Samuel. We know how Cypselus vowed to dedicate all the property of the citizens if he gained possession of Corinth, and with what skill he observed the letter of his vow whilst violating the spirit. But in practice the gods are not grasping. As they give men the world and its fruits subject to tribute, so they are content to leave the conquerors what they win provided that certain dues are paid, the tithe or firstfruits of the spoils. These dues are voluntary, in the sense that a man may choose whether he do right or wrong, but to deny them would be impious. They are however gladly given for the most part; and they are rightly counted among votive offerings.

One form of this tribute is the trophy (τρόπαιον), arms and armour of prize hung about some tree-trunk or pillar, or piled in a heap, on the foughten field: which as its name denotes is a memorial of the rout (τροπη), and Zeus is invoked as τρόπαιος by the fighting host. I do not doubt that this is an offering to the protecting deity, set up in that spot where he had proved his present power. Sometimes it is distinctly said that trophies are consecrated to the gods of battle, sometimes a permanent trophy is erected in a sanctuary. Sacrifice was done before a trophy periodically by the Athenians both at Marathon and Salamis, and doubtless elsewhere.

In legend Pollux erects a trophy for his victory over Lynceus. The trophy is recorded as far back as the eighth century in Sparta, the seventh century in Athens, and except Macedon was universal in Greek lands. The trophy was so much a matter of course, that it was erected for victory even when spoils there were none. Perhaps it is not too much to assume that this is the earliest form of war-dedication, independent of temples, and accepted by the protecting gods as Pan accepted the trophies of the chace hung upon some mountain pine. But the usual practice was also to dedicate in some temple the choice pieces, the firstfruits, or the tithe of spoils, as we see in our cathedrals the flags of our ancient foes. The booty was collected, and a portion set apart for the gods; this was either dedicated all, or a part of it, the remainder being sold and the proceeds used to procure some offering of price or magnificence.

Now and then a permanent trophy made of bronze or some other material was set up in a sanctuary. The Persians, if the common report be true, intended to make one such in 490 if they had not been defeated. Pausanias mentions a battle fought in the Altis at Olympia between the Eleans and the Lacedaemonians: the Eleans, who won the day, erected a bronze trophy with an inscription upon the shield, under a plane tree in the Altis. A similar memorial was put up after Leuctra. A bronze trophy was dedicated at Delphi by the Aetolians, after they had chastised the Gauls for their horrific treatment of Callium. Trophies of Gallic arms in relief were carved on the temple of Athena at Pergamus, built in memory of the defeats of the Gauls. The Mantineans, to commemorate a defeat of Agis, placed a stone trophy “over against the temple of Poseidon”; the Argives, having conquered the Lacedaemonians, placed the like beside a tomb in Argos. The permanent trophy at Marathon was of white marble.

When the practice of dedicating the tithe of spoils became general, we have no means of learning. There is no direct evidence in the Homeric poems of a systematic dedication of arms or tithe by the conquerors, or of any vow made against the taking of Troy. When Pausanias relates that Polyneices made an offering before attacking Thebes, this is evidence only that the later Greeks believed the practice of their own day to be as old as the heroic age. The inference that it was really so is, however, not unreasonable, in view of the practice of single warriors. Hector, when about to fight with Ajax, vows to dedicate the spoil in Athena’s temple at Troy. 2 Ulysses, being out of reach of the temples of his native land, hangs the bloody armour of Dolon “upon the poop of a ship, to make a shrine for Athena.” Menelaus dedicated the spoils of Euphorbus in the Argive Heraeum; where Pythagoras, who claimed that the soul of the hero breathed in him, proved his claim by recognising the arms he once had borne. 4 In the caves of Dicte and Ida in Crete lance-heads and shields have been found which belong to the Dorian period. 5 We know how Alcaeus’ shield was captured by the Athenians in 606 and hung up in Athena’s shrine. Aeschylus speaks of arms and foemen’s dresses pierced with the spear-point as hung in temples, Euripides of the spoils of the Amazons dedicated by Heracles at Delphi, and Pindar of the dedication of choice prize.

There are dedications of the war-tithe at Apollonia, Athens, Branchidae, Crete, Mantinea, Megara, Boeotia, and Sparta; at Delphi by Athenians, Caphyes, Chians, Liparians, Spartans, and Tarentines; at Olympia by Cleitorians, Eleans, Messenians, Spartans, and Thurians. But it must be remembered that all dedications of war-spoils are either tithe or firstfruit.

If cattle formed part of the booty, a part of these would be sacrificed. The tithe of captives was also reserved, and sent to Delphi or some other sanctuary: at first for sacrifice, doubtless, or to be temple slaves, which happened to the daughter of Teiresias; but by softening of manners they were later sent forth to found colonies. The Dryopians, conquered by Heracles, and dedicated, went forth to found Asine. But the Greeks were more merciful than their own Apollo, who hung up the very skin of Marsyas in a cave. Thebes was "decimated" by the Greeks for its defection to the Persian side; and the writers use the phrase in a way which shows it needed no explanation. For other reasons, a tithe of men was dedicated by Chalcis\(^1\), and firstfruits of men by Crete\(^2\). The tithe of ransom was also dedicated\(^3\). In historical times the consecration of the war-tithe was a matter of course\(^4\), and applied not only to the enlisted hosts but to privateers\(^5\).

We may now pass in review the chief instances of the dedication of spoils, in historical order: and first the enemy’s weapons, armour, and equipment, the material of war.

The earliest recorded naval memorial comes from the war waged between Athens and Megara for the possession of Salamis. The Megarians commemorated one victory (which must have taken place about B.C. 600, before Solon aroused the Athenians to reconquer the island) by placing the bronze beak of a prize ship in the Olympieum at Megara\(^6\). Another such was erected by the Aeginetans, who somewhere about 520 conquered a colony of Samians settled at Cydonia in Crete. The beaks of their ships, which were boars’ heads, they hung up in the temple of Athena in Aegina\(^7\). The beak became the regular token of the captured galley, as we shall see later\(^8\). It is worth mentioning that the roof of the Odeum at Athens was made from the masts and timbers of Persian ships\(^9\).

The great struggle in Sicily between Carthaginian and Greek left, as might have been expected, many traces. Amongst them are the spoils which Pausanias declares to have been dedicated by Gelo and the Syracusans for some victory gained by sea or land\(^10\): three linen corselets, doubtless taken from the dead bodies of their foes. The spoils are generally assigned to the battle of Himera, B.C. 480; but we shall see cause to think that they really belong to an unknown victory of much earlier date. A more interesting relic, from the battle of Cumae in 474, when Hiero defeated the Tyrrenians and his victory was sung by Pindar himself, was found at Olympia. It is a bronze helmet, much battered, and inscribed in what appears to be a rude attempt at verse. Two other articles of the same batch of spoils have been found, the remains doubtless of a larger sending.

In the early years of the fifth century an obscure war between the Phocians and the Thessalians seems to have given cause for votive offerings on both sides. The Phocians we know to have been victorious in one affair, when Tellias of Elis whitewashed six hundred men, who so struck terror into their adversaries that they slew no less than four thousand. For their victory the Phocians sent half the captured shields to Delphi and half to Abae. The effect of the stratagem, though it was intended merely to help recognition, reminds us of Lord Dundonald, when in command of a crazy cockboat he kept the whole Biscay coast on a flutter. He once blacked the faces of his whole crew, including doctor and supernumeraries, and launched upon the deck of a Spanish ship of war every man who had legs to walk; before the enemy discovered that these yelling monsters were not devils, the Englishmen had won the ship.

When we come to the Persian Wars, there is some confusion in the accounts of thank-offerings on the Greek side, because Marathon came later to overshadow all other victories in the popular imagination. Whether because this victory was won without any outside help save the Plataeans, or for whatever reason, votive offerings were attracted to it as jokes to Sydney Smith, or Psalms to King David. There are a number of bronze weapons in the Acropolis Museum at Athens, which must be earlier than 480, and may well have come from Marathon; but there is nothing to prove it. Amongst them are helmets, one inscribed to Athena; shields, but not all these have had to do with war; heads and butts of lances, some inscribed with Athena’s name; and swords. Plutarch records that one Lycomedes, who captured the first prize at Artemisium, dedicated the ensign or figurehead of this ship to Apollo Daphnephoros at Athens. After Salamis, the Greeks in general dedicated amongst other things three Phoenician triremes: one at the Isthmus, which Herodotus saw; one at Sunium; and one to Ajax at Salamis. The Athenians consecrated in the Erechtheum Masistius’ golden cuirass and the sword of Mardonius. In 447 Tolmides led a rash expedition into Boeotia to quell a rising of exiles, and was slain: the Thebans afterwards erected a trophy on Mount Helicon to Athena Itonia.

All these may be regarded as public offerings; but there are not wanting private ones from the same period. Themistocles, we learn, sent a part of his own spoils to Delphi; but the Pythia told him to take them home again. It is hard to say why Apollo, after accepting so many treasures of the vile barbarians, should boggle at this; unless the sender found means himself to procure the answer. The explanation suggested by Pausanias, that the god knew Themistocles would end his days in Persia, and did not wish to make the Persian king hate him, does credit to someone’s ingenuity. Perhaps it was an afterthought of the oracle. An Athenian Callias also sent thither a horse, which he had taken in the Persian Wars. Sailors dedicate prize arms to Leto.

After the Eurymedon (469), the southern wall of the Acropolis of Athens was built with the proceeds of the spoils; and Cimon, we are told, adorned this wall with "the spoils of Mycale and the rebellious islands." The Athenians sent also a tithe of these to Delphi.

Other dedications of arms are of less certain date. At Dodona a bronze tablet was found, bearing a legend which declares it to belong to Peloponnesian spoils. The shapes of the letters suggest that it dates from the middle of the fifth century; it has consequently been assigned to the great sea-fight off Aegina in 460, where the Corinthians, Epidaurians, and Aeginetans were defeated. The arms named on the much-talked-of Colonnade of the Athenians at Delphi may have come from the same battle. After the sack of Thurii, the Tarentines appear to have sent captured arms to Olympia. There three spearheads were found, inscribed as spoils from Thurii. Arms taken from the Spartans by the Methoneans, and found in the same place, are ascribed by Ziemann to the period 440–420.

Phormio, after his brilliant victories in the Gulf of Corinth (429), seems to have dedicated a quantity of arms at Delphi, and the Peloponnesians on their part offered a prize-ship in Poseidon's temple at Rhium not far from the battle-scene. The signal success of Demosthenes over the Ambraciots in 426 secured an immense booty. The general's own share of the spoils was no fewer than three hundred panoplies, which were dedicated in the Athenian temples. The shields of the Spartans captured at Sphacteria (425) were hung in the Painted Colonnade. By their side were afterwards hung the shields of the Scionaeans, when their revolt had been quelled in 423. When the Syracusans in 413 annihilated the Athenian army, they must have followed the usual custom; for in Plutarch's day we learn that a shield magnificently adorned was still shown in one of the Syracusan temples as that of Nicias.

Passing on to the fourth century, we first meet with a memorial of Iphicrates, who in 392 did a brilliant feat of arms by annihilating a Spartan regiment. It is natural to assign to this victory a gilt shield which he dedicated on the Acropolis. After Leuctra (371), the Thebans hung up the Spartan shields which they had taken in the temple of Demeter at Thebes. Timoleon's victory of the Crimesus (343) may have been commemorated by the offering of a two-horse car, if an inscription of the fourth century (which is sadly mutilated) be rightly restored. We know there were war-wagons in the Carthaginian host, and that the victor dedicated the best of the spoils.

Be that how it might, there is record of a trophy set up by

Mamercus tyrant of Catana, who making common cause with Carthage slew a body of Timoleon's mercenaries. He dedicated their shields, and proud of his poetic skill, himself composed the following epigram, worthy of the latter-day music halls¹:

Alexander the Great, after the battle of the Granicus (334), sent to Athens three hundred suits of Persian mail; some of the shields were hung on the architrave of the Parthenon². When he defeated Porus (326), he sent the royal elephant to the Temple of the Sun at Taxila³. It is doubtless a mere accident that we hear of no other spoils offered by this magnificent person, who was Greek of the Greeks in his religious practices, and spread Grecian customs over half Asia.

Greece now comes in contact with east and west, yet the practice of dedicating spoils continues. Shields of the Gaulish barbarians, after their repulse in 280, were dedicated at Delphi⁴. Pyrrhus, after his return from Rome, defeated Antigonus at the head of a mixt force of Gauls and Macedonians (274). The arms of the Gauls he offered to Athena Itonia at her temple between Pherae and Larissa; the Macedonian arms he sent to Dodona⁵. Some of the arms found at Dodona by M. Carapanos, and in his private museum at Athens, may have been part of this offering. Pyrrhus also made a dedication to Zeus of the Waters at Dodona, for some victory gained over the Romans⁶. In 272 Pyrrhus was killed in the streets of Argos; and his shield was hung up in the temple of Demeter there⁷. Demetrius Poliorcetes also sent shields to Delphi⁸.

Foreign potentates followed the same fashion. The long struggle between kings of Pergamus and the Gauls seems to have been specially commemorated by Attalus II in his own name and his predecessors; and in the splendid memorial pile built for this purpose, the Gallic spoils were displayed. No tribe so obscure that it did not follow this custom. So Mummius, after the custom which also prevailed in his own country, but himself the first Roman to dedicate war-spoils in a Grecian temple, sent to Olympia a number of the shields captured at Corinith (146).

The ancient caves of Crete contained, as I have said, arms of offence and defensive armour. In the great sanctuaries of Delphi, Olympia, and Dodona, at Athens, and elsewhere weapons of war have been amongst the finds. At Olympia a large number of bronze shields were found, most of them entire. Sometimes it is possible, as in the case of Hiero's helmet, to identify them; more often they are without inscriptions, or if inscribed, give no clue to the dedicator. We have, for example, inscribed spear-heads from Olympia, and one from the Peloponnese bearing what is clearly a private dedication. Spear-heads and lance-butts from the Acropolis of Athens have been mentioned already; in the same place were found bronze arrow-heads, though none inscribed. At Athens were also found swords, knives, an axe-head, and helmets; at Olympia shields, greaves and corselets, the last engraved with scenes in the geometric style. A helmet once actually used in war, and dedicated by the Argives, is now in the British Museum; another very old helmet, found in the Alpheus, is inscribed of Zeus. Yet another, found in South

In Delos was also a Heracleote bow and quiver, inlaid with gold, an iron spear, helmets, one being silvered, cavalry swords and sheaths, an ε̣χινη στρατιωτική (be that what it may), a ship’s beak and anchors. A spear-head was found at Acraephia (Boeotia) dedicated to Apollo. Iron lanceheads have been found at Orchomenus, and there was a Sarmatian corselet in the Asclepieum at Athens. A cuirass, said to have come from Epidaurus, is inscribed to Zeus Cronion. To the same class we must assign a marble base found at Delos, which once bore a four-horse chariot dedicated to Apollo “from the spoils.” Perhaps the tithe offered to Athena at Megara by a company of persons, whose names have been lost, was a private dedication.

Scanning the Athenian lists we see in the Hecatompedos shields, missiles of many kinds, spears, breast-plates, helmets, swords and cavalry sabres, greaves, horse-trappings, and a panoply. A spear-stump occurs in the fragmentary Eleusinian list. It is not certain that all were votive, although most were so.

Thus we have a continuous tradition of the dedication of foemen's arms from the heroic age down to the loss of Greek independence; and it would be easy to trace it further. Less commonly heard of is another custom, by which the victor dedicates the arms which helped him to win the victory; or the old warrior no longer fit for the fight, his outworn weapons of war. The thought seems to us so natural, and is indeed so frequently exemplified in later days, that we are surprised at first in meeting with so little evidence before the days of Alexander the Great. Perhaps rightly considered it involves a self-consciousness not suited to earlier and more simple times. Simonides gave it the noblest expression, and he could hardly have been drawing on his imagination when he wrote—

τάξα τάδε πτολέμου πεπαυμένα δακρυόεντος
νηφ Αθηναίς κείται ύπωρόφια, παλακί δή στονόεντα κατὰ κλόνον έν δαί φωτών
Περσῶν ἵππομάχων αὔματι λουσάμενα.

Meleager elaborated the same thought from another side, in the lines—

τίς τάδε μοι θυντῶν τὰ περὶ θριγκοῖσιν ἀνήφεν σκῦλα, παναισχίστην τέρψιν Ἐυραλίου;
οὗτε γάρ αὐγανέαι περιαγέες οὗτε τι πήληξ ἀλλοφοσ οὗτε φόνῳ χραυθέν ἄρηρε σίκοις· ἀλλ' αὐτως γανόοντα καὶ ἀστυφέλικτα σιδάρω, οἶα περ οὐκ ἐνοπᾶς, ἀλλὰ χορῶν ἐναρα.
οῖς θάλαμον κοσμεῖτε γαμήλιον' ὅπλα δὲ λύθρῳ λειβόμενα βροτέρ σηκὸς Ἀρνος ἔχου.

But there are indications that the custom was not unknown in very early times. I say nothing of the weapons of Homeric heroes, for they were no doubt spurious, and in any case the dedicator generally remains unknown. But Aristomenes the Messenian, who had lost his shield in the victory he gained single-handed over a Spartan regiment, on recovering it dedicated it to Trophonius at Lebadea. Simonides celebrates a spear grown old in warfare; and Anyte, if we may venture to suppose this fine poetess to belong to an earlier age than the third century, may also be brought in evidence. The story of Cimon and the bridle, already related, points in the same direction. Herodotus mentions that King Nekôs, after taking Cadytis, dedicated to Apollo at Branchidae the costume he wore on that occasion. There is a spear-head from Sicyon, with the inscription Σεκυωνέων upon it in very ancient letters, which if dedicated must belong to this class. But these few examples exhaust the list of those recorded before the fourth century.

From the fourth century come a few more. The shield of Asopichus, a friend of Epameinondas, who did brave deeds, was dedicated in Delphi, but by whom does not appear. Alexander the Great seems to have been struck by the idea, and on visiting Troy he left his armour there in the temple, taking thence in exchange some which was reputed to have belonged to heroes of the great siege; a sacred shield was afterwards carried before him when he went to battle. If we may draw an inference from this, and from the cuirass and spear which he dedicated to Asclepius in the Arcadian Gortys, he may have shed his arms frequently as he marched along his conquering way. His example was followed by his namesake the son of Polyperchon, whose panoply is attested by an inscription to have been once on the Acropolis of Athens. A barbarian, probably in the fourth century, dedicated his helmet at Olympia. On the same principle, the shield of Leocritus, who was the first to leap into the Museum at Athens, and fell gloriously, when Olympiodorus drove out thence the Macedonian garrison in 288, was inscribed with his name and deed and dedicated to Zeus Eleutherios. So also Cydias the Athenian, who distinguished himself in the repulse of the Gauls from Delphi (280), was honoured in like manner. Lastly, in the Roman age, Flamininus, after his defeat of Philip in 197, sent his own shield inscribed to Delphi. So another Roman, perhaps one who fought against Mithradates, dedicated his shield "to the gods" at Syme. An impious offering was that of Alexander tyrant of Pherae, who dedicated the spear which he used to murder his own uncle Polyphron, about the year 370. He was wont in fact to wreathe it about with garlands, and to worship it as a god.

In the Anthology we meet with the principle of dedicating tools which were to be used no longer, under many forms; but examples of weapons are not many. In a daring epigram Mnasalcas (about 200 B.C.) imitates his master Simonides, and just overshoots the sublime:

σοι μὲν καμπύλα τόξα καὶ ιοχέαιρα φαρέτρα, δώρα παρα Προμάχου, Φοῖβε, τάδε κρέμαται: ίους δὲ πτερόεντας ἀνὰ κλόνον ἀνδρεὶς ἐχουσιν ἐν κραδίαις, ὀλοὰ ξείνια δυσμενεῶν.

spear, and cuirass to Ares, when he is too old to fight more; and his Nicagoras dedicates the battered remnants of a shield to Zeus. Echecratidas the Cretan, in an epigram of Anyte which has all her simple strength, dedicates his spear to Athena; Timanor to Pallas the shield which has protected him in many battles. The very war-trumpets come in for their turn. A whole armoury is offered in two other epigrams, one of which is of a degraded style, a vulgar slang, giving only single syllables for whole words. The votive epigram here becomes the means of breaking a paltry jest. But the lowest level is reached in that which celebrates the lover's triumph over Sochares the Cynic, whom he had captivated, and now dedicates over the lintel his staff, slippers and flask, and his wallet stuff full of wisdom.

Occasionally an offering was specially made in a shape which had direct reference to the spoils of war. Gilded shields have been mentioned already; but sometimes shields were made all of silver or gold, and hung up to adorn the temples. There were golden shields hung on the architrave of the Delphic temple, which Pausanias assigns to Marathon, but if Aeschines be right in telling us that they were inscribed as spoils of the Medes and Thebans together, they must belong to Plataea. In 457 the Lacedaemonians defeated the Athenians at Tanagra, and in memory of the fight they sent a golden shield to Olympia, where it was hung on the gable just under the statue of Victory. Flamininus sent silver targets to

The shield stood on a block, which was fixt on the top of the gable. Three bits of it have been found, bearing parts of each line: Olympia, Ergebnisse, Die Inschriften, no. 253. They agree with Pausanias, except in giving τοῦ instead Delphi. A marble model of a shield was dedicated by a general in Cos; others in Camirus.

On the same principle a four-horse chariot of bronze was made about the years 509—505. The Athenians had defeated a Boeotian force, and on the same day crossed over to Chalcis and gained a second victory. Several hundreds of prisoners were taken, and kept in chains; but these being afterwards ransomed, their chains were hung up on the Acropolis, and a tithe of the ransom money was used in preparing the chariot, whose base has been found on the spot. There remain a few fragments of the original inscription, which Herodotus (who tells the story) preserves complete. Perhaps the chariot mentioned above was also made, like this, for the purpose of dedicating.

Another offering of the same class is a group of horses and captive women, made by Ageladas in bronze, which was sent to Olympia by the Tarentines, as victors over the Messapians in a border war (473). Pausanias mentions “another tithe of the Tarentines, from the spoils of the barbarous Peucetians,” sent to Delphi: being images of footmen and horsemen by Onatas, amongst them Opis king of the Iapygians who fought for the barbaric foe. Some time before the beginning of the Peloponnesian War, the Athenian Knights won a victory which was commemorated by the statue of a horse, set up on the Acropolis. Their leaders were Lacedaemonius son of Cimon, who was of the Doric τῶ. Pausanias speaks as though the inscr. were on the shield, as such often were; and perhaps the stone has a later copy made for some reason.

killed at Potidæa in 429, Xenophon, and another. It is not likely that the statues of men-at-arms, which are found in shrines, were meant for captives.

It is usually said that mock arms were sometimes made for soldiers to dedicate, but I have not found early evidence in support of this. There was a thin shield found at Olympia, which the Argives dedicated, useless as it stands; but it may have been merely a bronze casing for a substantial frame. The same must be said of the bronze casings from the Idaean Cave. A terra-cotta lance-head in Olympia, if it really be meant for a lance-head, is unique. Miniature models in the precious metals are not unknown. Lysander sent to Delphi a trireme of gold and silver, which Cyrus had given him in honour of Aegospotami, and there was another such at Delos. Silver shields are known at Athens and Delos. Some of these shields were buttons or ornaments, but it is impossible to say that none were dedicated by soldiers. There have also been found at Olympia knives, axes, helmets, and shields, and at Delos lance-heads and arrow-heads, shields, cuirasses, and axes in Crete and Lusi; small and of thin foil, which have no use and appear to have had no value. These are usually explained as soldiers' offerings, but as such they would be very mean. It is true that the Greeks were familiar with the idea of dedicating a valueless model, especially models of beasts, but also models of tripod: it is therefore conceivable that a soldier might have dedicated such trifles as these. On the other hand, he ought to have given part of his spoil, if he won any; and the things would have no meaning as models of anything but spoil, his own arms for example. It is not likely that toys would be dedicated at Olympia or Delos, and some of them, the axes at any rate, are so old that they are not likely to have been toys; for such toys belong to a somewhat advanced stage of culture. I have another explanation to offer of these anon\(^1\); and am fain to leave the question open.

Choice prize, not arms only, was commonly dedicated. Sthenelus is said to have dedicated at Larissa a three-eyed Zeus, taken by him at the sack of Troy\(^2\). Pausanias saw in temples at Elis and Argos statues taken at the sack of Tiryns\(^3\). Croesus sent to Apollo of Branchidae spoils taken from "an enemy" who had plotted against him\(^4\). At Olympia stood a group of suppliant boys, taken by the Agrigentines out of the spoils of Motye, a "barbarian city" of Sicily\(^5\). Xerxes' silver-footed throne was placed on the Acropolis of Athens after Salamis\(^6\); and the Tegeans dedicated to their Athena Alea a bronze manger which they found in Mardonius' tent on the Plataean battle-field\(^7\). Callias sent a horse to Olympia as part of the spoil taken by himself in the Persian war\(^8\). After the sack of Thebes, Alexander consecrated to Apollo at Cyme a hanging lamp which Pliny describes\(^9\). The statue of the jumper which Pausanias saw at Olympia was dedicated by the Thracian Mende, at an unknown date, after the sack of Sipte, as firstfruits of the spoils\(^10\). Whether the "statues" (\(\alpha\nu\delta\rho\iota\-\alpha\nu\tau\epsilon\varsigma\)) dedicated by the Liparians after conquering Tyrrhenian pirates\(^11\) were part of the spoil, or part of a group of victors or vanquish, does not appear; but we learn that they sent many remarkable tithes to Delphi from their perennial feud\(^12\). Perhaps the statue of Athena, sent to Delphi by the Achaeans after the sack of Phana in Aetolia, was part of the spoils of war. King Prusias II of Bithynia sent to Branchidae a number of articles which he seems to have taken in his sack of Pergamos (156). There is some reason to think that the veil of the temple at Jerusalem was dedicated at Olympia.

III. Other Commemorative Offerings.

It would be commonplace merely to dedicate to a god the money gained by selling his share of the booty, although such a gift doubtless had its charm for the recipients. Moreover this left no memorial, and was therefore unsatisfactory from the victor’s point of view; hence Agesilaus stands almost alone in our records when he sends a hundred talents of gold to Delphi as the tithe of his Asian spoils. Others may have done it, and the deed thought unworthy of record, especially if the sum were small. Votive coins indeed meet us by thousands in the treasure lists, but there is generally no clue to the occasion. It is however worth while to point out, that some of the magnificent Syracusan medallions bear on the exergue of the reverse a trophy of arms: these then may have been struck out of military spoils, and in particular from the spoils of the Athenian army in 413. If the view be right that the panoply represents a prize in the games, yet these games were instituted to commemorate victories, and these very prizes may have been arms taken from the enemy.

But the tithe-proceeds usually went to procure some permanent offering. Sometimes the offering had value chiefly or wholly for itself, as the sacred couches made out of captured iron and bronze, and dedicated to Hera by the Lacedaemonians who had destroyed Plataea. Sometimes the value lay in its meaning, as in the case of pictorial tablets. Usually there is something of both, as there is in the dedication of captured

Evans, Syracusan Medallions, 8, 142, etc. Victory crowns the charioteer on earlier coins of the required date (p. 153); they are usually interpreted as being connected with races.
We shall take first those in which material value predominates, the others second.

1. Buildings. When the tithe was large enough, or the giver sufficiently grateful, a temple or shrine was often built; and a certain number of these buildings were ascribed by tradition to this origin. Thus Heracles, after conquering Hippocrates and his sons, is said to have built a shrine to Athena Axiopoina and Hera Aigophagos; after conquering Elis, another to Apollo Pythian in Arcadia; and a third to Delphian Apollo, after conquering Phylas and the Dryopes. Theseus followed his example after he had vanquished Asterion, son of Minos, in Crete, by dedicating a temple to Athena the Saviour. Where the Amazons ceased their forward march, near the town of Pyrrhichus in Laconia, a temple was built to Artemis of the War-host.

Similar traditions, which may be true, but there is nothing to prove it, come from the borderland between history and fable. When the Dorians swarmed into the Peloponnese, they commemorated a victory near Sparta over the Achaeans and Amyclaes by founding a temple to Zeus of the Rout. In historical times Solon built a temple to Ares after taking Salamis. We have also the temple of Artemis of Good Fame at Athens, built from the spoils of the Medes; and the shrine of Pan in the cave on the Acropolis. It will be remembered that as Pheidippides the runner was sent to Sparta to appeal for help against the invader, Pan is said to have appeared in his path, upbraiding the Athenians for their neglect, in spite of many good deeds done them in the past, and more which he promised for the future. When the battle of Marathon was won, the runner’s tale was remembered; and “the shrine of Pan was founded beneath the Acropolis,” where the Athenians henceforth honoured him with yearly sacrifices.

and a torch-race\(^1\). At Salamis, a serpent appeared among the ships, and was interpreted to be the hero Cychreus; accordingly after the battle the Athenians erected a shrine to Cychreus, and a trophy of the battle, on that island\(^2\). Themistocles built in Melite a shrine to Artemis of Good Counsel\(^3\), and one at Peiraeus to Aphrodite\(^4\). The temple of Athena Areia at Plataea was rebuilt and refurnisht with eighty talents, which the Plataeans had received as the prize of valour at the battle of 479\(^5\). The Athenians erected a shrine by the Ilissus to Boreas, because he blew with his wind, and the ships of the Persians were scattered\(^6\). We have also temples erected from the spoils of the Carthaginians at Himera, to Demeter and the Maid, two at Syracuse and one at Etna\(^7\). The great temple and image of Zeus at Olympia are said by Pausanias\(^8\) to have been built from the spoils of Pisa, which was destroyed by Elis in the sixth century; but a variety of considerations\(^9\) go to fix the date of this temple between 480 and 457: if, as seems likely enough, war spoils did give the occasion and the means for building it, they probably came from a later war, perhaps that mentioned by Herodotus and Strabo\(^10\). The beautiful temple of Wingless Victory on the Acropolis of Athens must commemorate some feat of arms; it cannot commemorate the capture of Sphacteria (425) and the Peace of Nicias, since the decree which directs the building of it goes to prove that the temple is older than the Propylaea, and it must belong to some earlier battle, Oenophyta for instance, or Oenoe\(^11\).

The tithe of spoils won by Xenophon’s army of Greeks was allotted to Apollo and Ephesian Artemis, each general taking a portion of it into his charge. What Xenophon did with Apollo’s share he does not state; it was not used for a temple¹. But the share of the goddess he took with him to Greece, and at Scyllus bought with it a plot of ground upon which he built a temple, which, to compare small with great, was as like as possible to the Ephesian, with a grove about it, and there held annual feasts².

Conon, after defeating the Persian fleet at Cnidus (394), dedicated a temple to Zeus the Saviour at Athens³, and one to Aphrodite at Peiraeus beside the sea⁴. This was probably Aphrodite of the Fair Voyage, under which title she was worshipped at Cnidus. In some feud between Elis and Arcadia, the Eleans founded a temple of Eileithyia and Sosipolis at Olympia⁵, and in Elis a shrine to Sosipolis alone⁶. For material magnificence probably no votive shrine could vie with those which commemorated the victories of the kings of Pergamus over the Gauls⁷. Eumenes II (197—159), we learn from Strabo⁸, adorned the city and temples in many ways, and offered up thank-offerings for his successes; while Attalus II seems to have commemorated his predecessors' victories as well as his own, according to the inscription discovered on the spot. The temple of Athena was rebuilt, and a great altar was erected to Zeus; the temple was adorned by trophies of arms carved upon it, and the altar with the battle of gods and giants, a "heroic precedent." It remains to mention that after Actium (31), the Mantineans, who fought on Octavius' side, dedicated a temple to Aphrodite Symmachia: this goddess being no doubt chosen because of the legendary connexion of Aeneas with Rome. So, in modern times, after the repulse of the Turks from Rhodes in 1480, d'Aubusson built a chapel to Notre Dame de la Victoire, whose image is still in the Latin chapel at Rhodes.

A distinct class of votive buildings is formed by the Treasuries and Colonnades, which were erected at great national shrines. The Treasuries are cell-like buildings, much of a shape with temples but on a small scale, being a cella with a foreroom, opening through a couple of pillars between antae. The foundations of twelve have been found at Olympia; Pausanias mentions seven at Delphi, and there were besides five others, making the same total; at Delos again several are known to have existed. These buildings were used as show-houses for the display of votive offerings. The first we can assign to a victory in war is the Megarian Treasury at Olympia, built with the spoils of some victory we cannot identify. Pausanias gives it an absurdly high date, but the evidence of the remains is conclusive for the later part of the sixth century. To the gable was affixed a shield, which bore an inscription.

2 Paus. viii. 9. 6. The list might be carried further, if it were my purpose to go down into Roman times. The latest I have met with is a shrine dedicated to Zeus by Jovianus, about 363 A.D., when he restored the pagan worship, Ἐλληνικὴ τεμήνη καὶ βωμὸς ἐξαλαπάζας: IGS iii. 1. 721.

telling that the building had been made from Corinthian spoils. Not much later is the Treasury built by the Syracusans, commonly called of Carthage. It contained a colossal image of Zeus and three linen corslets, which Pausanias declares to have been the offering of Gelo the Syracusan for some victory either by sea or land. The words of Pausanias are not clear to decide whether the Treasury itself was to be of the same dedication, but I think he did mean this, and that its common title, Treasury of the Carthaginians, refers to its origin. The spoils are generally assigned to the battle of Himera (480), but this date is many years too late for the building. It is possible that both building and spoils were dedicated, as Pausanias says, by Gelo, after some victory we know nothing of, when he may have been in command though not yet tyrant; or it may be the spoils belong to Himera, and the building to this earlier victory, by whomsoever dedicated; or the treasury may have been dedicated by the Syracusans before Gelo came on the scene. Style of architecture and sculpture, and the alphabet used in the inscription, alike point to the years 510—500 at latest; and there are indications that the cities of eastern Sicily did about that time wage a dire struggle with Carthage, in which they were victorious. The Athenian Treasury at Delphi was built out of the spoils of Marathon, and on the metopes were carved the Battle of Gods and Giants, with the deeds of Heracles and Theseus: clearly a heroic precedent like those of Pergamus. “Brasidas and the Acanthians” used the Athenian spoils to build another of these cells in the same place. When the Athenian empire went to wreck in Sicily,

4 Paus. x. 11. 5. The remains of the inscription cannot be fitted in with his words: BCH xx. 608 'Αθηναίοι τωι Απόλλωνι από Μηδών ακροθίνα τῆς Μαραθώνι μάχης.
5 See Frazer’s note, and BCH xvii. 217 ff., 612, xviii. 169. A terrace next this building bears the inscription, which has been cut or re-cut in the third century, 'Αθηναίοι τάπολλων ακροτίνα τῆς Μαραθώνιον: the explanation is unknown (Cecil Smith, in Frazer, l.c.).

the Syracusans built their Treasury at Delphi (413)\(^1\). After the battle of Leuctra (371) the Theban Treasury was founded there also\(^3\). As to the other Treasuries, it is fair to conjecture that some of those whose origin is not attested were built from war-spoils. This is probable for the one which Cypselus, tyrant of Corinth in the seventh century, erected at Delphi\(^2\), and for the Sicynonian Treasury there, which belongs to the early sixth century\(^3\). Others are mentioned, dedicated by Croesus and Gyges\(^4\), by Massilia\(^5\), and by the city of Spina on the Adriatic coast\(^6\). The Cnidian Treasury, in spite of Pausanias' statement, seems to have been built from a tithe of war\(^7\).

Occasionally the victor preferred to build a colonnade from war-spoil. Thus the Spartans built in their own city what was called the Persian Colonnade, in which were statues of Mardonius, Queen Artemisia, and others, “from the Persian spoils\(^8\)”: statues of Persians in their barbaric dress supported the roof in place of pillars\(^9\). A colonnade of the Athenians at Delphi has given rise to much controversy\(^10\). The inscription, which is complete, still remains on the spot where it was placed\(^11\). The alphabet is puzzling, some of the letters pointing forward in time and some back. Röhl assigns it to the time of Peisistratus, U. Kohler to a victory won over the Aeginetans about 490; Pausanias again gives the victory to Phormio\(^12\), which is impossible, not only from the antiquity of the script, but because Phormio's victories, though brilliant, were not considerable enough to have afforded so rich a booty. The probabilities are in favour of some victory between 490 and the mid-century, such as the sea-fight of Cecryphalea off Aegina in 460. Another colonnade, called Myropolis, was built by Aristodemus, who was tyrant of Megalopolis before the Achaean league, after defeating Acrotatus and his Lacedaemonian soldiers of fortune. There was also a colonnade in Elis built from spoils of Coreyla. Some kind of building appears to have been dedicated at Athens by the Tarentines during the period of their alliance (280—279), perhaps for the victory of Heraclea. Colonnades were amongst the buildings erected by Attalus II.

To the same category belongs an altar which is connected with Plataea. After the battle of 479, the united Greeks decreed exalted honours to the city, promising them eternal independence and protection; and there they built an altar to Zeus Eleutherios, with an inscription by Simonides. This is the only altar I have noticed as dedicated for a feat of war, until we come to the end of Greek history, when Mummius dedicates an altar to the gods at Thebes. But perhaps the altar of the Chians at Delphi was one such. The altar, however, was not an obvious offering nor a thing beautiful in itself; it was not necessarily built at all, and it was often made of the ashes of immemorial sacrifices.

2. Divine statues. An obvious dedicatory offering was the statue (ἀγαλμα) of the protecting deity, and examples are many. Cypselus having vowed to dedicate the goods of the Corinthians if he won Corinth, used the money to procure a golden Zeus which he sent to Delphi1. At the beginning of the second Messenian War (685—668) the Spartans are said to have dedicated a statue of Zeus which Pausanias saw at Olympia, thus inscribed:

δέξο, φάναξ Κρονίδα, Ζεῦ 'Ολύμπιε, καλὸν ἀγαλμα ιλήφων θυμώι τοῖς Λακεδαιμονίοις.

The base of this statue has been found, and is a useful proof of the uncertainty of these early traditions: the alphabet is of the sixth rather than the seventh century, and the inscription has even been claimed for the Messenian revolt of 4642. Some warlike feat must be commemorated by the great statues found on the Sacred Way in Branchidae, for nothing else surely could have so magnificent a tithe3. The oldest of many memorials of the great struggle between Carthaginian and Greek in Sicily, is an inscription of Selinus, which belongs to the middle of the sixth century; this appears to record a vow made before the fight, that when peace was made statues of gold should be erected to guardian deities; but the fragmentary state of it makes certainty impossible4. From the same struggle we have an Apollo dedicated by the Massaliots at Delphi, as the firstfruits of the sea-fight with the Carthagi-nians5. Gelos’s thank-offering after Himera included a colossal

Zeus'. There was a standing feud between Thessaly and Phocis; and when fortune looked with favour on the Thessalians, they dedicated a Zeus at Olympia. The Lipari had much ado to protect themselves against Tyrrenian pirates, and many a victory sent its tithe to Delphi. Once the Pythia, it is said, told them to put to sea with as few ships as possible; they accordingly sent out a squadron of five. The Tyrrenians, with more romantic pride than one would expect of pirates, thought shame to meet them with a larger number. The five pirates were defeated and taken, and a like fate befell three other squadrons of five ships each which followed. The victors then sent to Delphi an Apollo for each captured ship. Miltiades, as we have seen, had special cause to be grateful to Pan; he consequently dedicates a statue of Pan, perhaps in the Acropolis cave, and Simonides writes him the epigram. The famous bronze Athena Champion, which stood in front of the Parthenon, was said to have been made by Pheidias from the Marathonian tithe; no doubt it was set up at the close of the Persian Wars, and called after Marathon by the loose convention already spoken of. After Salamis, a colossal image of Apollo was erected at Delphi, and one of Zeus at Olympia, by the Greeks in common. The tithe of Plataea was used to purchase two colossi: one of Poseidon to be placed on the Isthmus, its face set towards the rising sun; and one of Zeus for Olympia. Another Zeus was given to the same place by the Argive Epidaurians, out of Median spoils; and a third, this colossal, by the Clitorians as a "tithe from many cities." Deliverance from a wandering horde of Mardonius's men was the occasion for dedicating the Saviour Artemis at Megara. Later, in 445, the Megarians revolted from Athens, and slew most of the Athenian garrison; in memory of which they sent an Apollo to Delphi. After the Sacred War (346), the Amphictyons set up an Apollo at Delphi, and the Thebans a Heracles. There was a bronze Apollo in the Pythium at Athens, dedicated as a war-tithe about the middle of the fourth century. The people of Patrae, who had helped the Athenians to fight the Gauls, set up a statue of Apollo in their own capital. The Colossus of Rhodes was procured with the money got by selling the siege-engines of Demetrius Poliorcetes, who gave them to the Rhodians when he was forced to raise the siege (303). Mummius set up at Olympia two bronze statues of Zeus; and after Actium, one Nicippe dedicated a statue of Aphrodite in the temple then built for her honour.

We know of one divine statue dedicated by a private person for success in war: Hegelochus the alien did this at Athens in the fifth century. It may be that some of the archaic 'Apollos' discovered in Bocotia or other places are images of the deity, Apollo or who not, dedicated for this cause. One bronze figure of this type at least is inscribed as a tithe; and there is no indication that it was a trade-tithe. A fuller discussion will be found in a succeeding chapter.

Two items call for remark. Cimon, after his victory on the Strymon (477), was allowed as a special honour to set up two Hermae in the Street of Hermæ, but without inscribing his name upon them. I do not know whether he regarded Hermes as the source of his good luck, or whether the motive was pride. The other is the dedication of the Saviour Demigods, the Dioscuri no doubt, to Poseidon at Elatea, in memory of some signal deliverance. The inscription dates from the fourth century; and I cannot believe with M. Paris that the lines have been recent and that the dedication belongs to an earlier age, perhaps to the affray when Tellias struck terror into his adversaries by means of a coat of whitewash, because the dedication of the statue of a deity to whom gratitude is due is always made to that deity himself while Greek religion is sincere.

3. Artistic representation of the human act blest by the god. To set up a divine statue was one way of acknowledging his power; and although we are not often told what the figure lookt like, we know that the plastic genius of Greece often express this power by clothing him in attributes, such as armour, and by placing weapons in his hand. As the faculty of artistic expression grew, attempts were made to depict in some way the effect of that power, or more precisely the event wherein he had shown it. The Odes of Pindar show us how the Greek mind would naturally regard human life in relation to higher things; and as he seeks out heroic or mythological precedent for the feats which he celebrates, so victories in war were sometimes commemorated by a mythological or allegorical group. So is explained the scene on the Aegina pediment, so the metopes of the Parthenon. In the offerings which we have first to do with, there is no realism. At most along with the divine and heroic figures, mortal man whose strong arm has helped may sometimes be found.

6 For this point see ch. xiv. It is true that if the dedication refers to peril at sea, there would be some fitness from a latter-day standpoint; but it has yet to be proved that this was true of the great age. If these figures were a group in action they may be older; see next section.
This is the meaning of the group sent to Olympia by the Argives for their victory at Oenoe: the seven who fought against Thebes and the Epigoni, together with the chariot of Amphiaraus and his charioteer Baton. At Olympia also, upon a great pedestal, stood Zeus, Thetis, and the Day, with a number of Homeric heroes in fighting pairs, the group being the tithe of Abantis sent by the city of Apollonia on the Ionian sea. A group of Heracles and Apollo, striving for the tripod, was dedicated at Delphi by the Phocians after their defeat of the Thessalians. Attalus I commemorated his Gallic victories by several groups on the Acropolis of Athens: battles of the gods and giants, of the Athenians with the Amazons, and the battle of Marathon, then held of equal importance with the great deeds of legend. Perhaps the cedar-wood group of the struggle of Heracles with Achelous, in the Megarian treasury at Delphi, was meant in the same way. At some date unknown, the citizens of Heraclea Pontica, having conquered a barbaric tribe, the Mariandyni, sent to Olympia a group representing the Labours of Heracles: the Lion, the Hydra, Cerberus, and the Erymanthian Boar. The same principle must also explain an Argive offering at Delphi, a bronze copy of the Wooden Horse of Troy, bought from Lacedaemonian spoils. This should belong to the successful raid of Argives into the Thyreatis in 414, when they took booty to the amount of five-and-twenty talents. Perhaps the “Wooden Horse” of bronze on the Athenian acropolis had a similar origin.

1 Paus. i. 15. 1 with Frazer’s note; x. 10. 4. C. Robert (Hermes xxv. 412) places the battle between 463 and 458; this date is supported by IGA 165, where the sculptors of the group, Hypatodorus and Aristogeiton, are named in an inscr. assigned to the early 5th century. Another expression of the same idea is a group including the protecting deities, together with personifications of the dedicating states, either in the form of the local heroes or otherwise, sometimes also the commander or anyone who had rendered signal help in the event. The Phocians, after the successful stratagem of Tellias the soothsayer, sent figures of their local heroes to Delphi and Abae, with Tellias and their generals, Rhoeus and Daiphantes. Another group was sent by the Athenians to Delphi after the Persian Wars: in the presence of Apollo and Athena stood Erechtheus, Cecrops, Pandion, Leos, Antiochus son of Heracles, Aegeus, and Acamas, all tribal eponyms; Codrus, Theseus, and Phyleus, ancient chiefs; and the general Miltiades. The three remaining eponyms, Ajax, Hippothoon, and Oeneus, must surely have formed part of the original dedication; but when Pausanias saw the group, these three statues had been dubbed with the names of Antigonus, Demetrius, and Ptolemy, who had given their names to later Athenian tribes. After Salamis, a colossal statue was set up at Delphi, holding in one hand a ship's beak; the word ἀνδριάς, used by Herodotus, cannot apply to the Apollo mentioned by Pausanias, and it was probably a local personification of Aegina, or Salamis. The Arcadians, after ravaging Laconia, probably under Epaminondas (370–69), sent to Delphi a large group: images of Apollo and Victory, of Callisto mother of Areas by Apollo, of γέλων ἐκ Καλλης ἀνδριάς. But this appears to be a private dedication.

1 Herod. viii. 27; Paus. x. 1. 8, 13. 6.
2 Pausanias says (1) the sculptor was Pheidias, (2) the group was really and truly part of the Marathon battle-tithe. It is hard to reconcile these statements, unless we suppose that the money was kept unused for a long time. It should be noted that Miltiades soon fell into ill odour, and so the date is likely to be after his death.
3 Paus. x. 10. 1. If the three last had been new statues, there was no reason for taking away the three which are missing, and I therefore assume that only the names were changed.

6 Paus. x. 14. 5. Hero statues were so called: Arist. Peace 1183 τὸν ἀνδριάντα τῶν Πανδίωνος. We read also of one of gold, not described, bought with Median spoils: Epist. Philippi 179 (speaking of Amphipolis) Ἀλεξάνδρου τοῦ προγόνου κατασχόντος τῶν τόπων δθεον καὶ τῶν αἰχμαλώτων Μήδων ἀπορμηχαν ἀνδριάντα χρυσοῦν ἀνέστησεν εἰς Δελφοῖς.
Arcas, and his sons. Tolmides and his soothsayer stood on the acropolis of Athens, as part of a group with Erechtheus fighting against Eumolpus. This should refer to the raid on the Peloponnese in 455, when Gythium was burned and Cythera taken. Similarly Actolia was placed at Delphi amidst a group of protecting deities, Apollo, Artemis, and Athena, and the generals Polyarchus and Eurydamus, when the Aetolians conquered the Gauls (280). A type of Aetolian coins struck after this date seems to have been copied from this figure; whence it would appear that she was seated upon a pile of arms.

Lysander’s oriental ostentation was doubtless to blame for the tone of his group dedicated after Aegospotami. There stood Zeus, Apollo, Artemis, Poseidon, and the Dioscuri, there stood Lysander and all his admirals, his pilot, and his priest; and Poseidon was placing a crown on Lysander’s head.

The event itself might be more realistically presented. A group dedicated by the Tarentines at Olympia consisted of a number of horsemen and footmen, with King Opis coming to help the Peucetii; he is dying, and over him stand the heroes Taras and Phalantheus, and a dolphin is near. It is inscribed as a tithe of the Peucetian spoils.

Attalus I added a group representing his Gallic victory to the great historic fights mentioned above.

Groups representing a man Phormis, a Maenalian, fighting with various foes were dedicated by a friend, Lycortas the Syracusan, in Olympia.

Ol., Paus. vi. 19. 12). It is to be noted that the Sardinians sent a statue of their eponym to Delphi (Paus. x. 17. 1). Pausanias calls them barbarians, but this was perhaps a superficial view (cp. Towards the end of the fifth century, reliefs began to be commonly used for dedication; and a few of them suggest war. Some indeed are inscribed; there is no doubt about the battle-scene dedicated by a cavalry commander at Eleusis, which belongs to the fifth century: horsemen are chasing and cutting down the enemy. Others, though not inscribed, show warlike subjects: Victory and a trophy, warriors armed or wounded men, or a ship. Now a battle-scene on land seems to be represented, now a sea-fight. A Roman copy of a Greek original has Victory holding a ship’s taffrail-ornament (ἀφλαστοῦν), and an armed warrior beside a pillar wreathed with a snake. So perhaps the reliefs where Athena stands by a trophy of arms hung on a tree; or she stands armed, a Victory in her hand, between an armed and an unarmed man, the latter holding up one hand in the attitude of worship. The warrior pouring a libation may represent the thank-offering after battle. That the relief or picture was familiar in the fourth century we learn from the story of Charon, a Theban, who helpt Epaminondas and Pelopidas to free the country, and afterwards won the victory in a cavalry fight shortly before Leuctra (371). Androcydes of Cyzicus was just then at work on a relief or painting (πίνακος) of some other battle, which when the revolution took place was all but done. This had been preserved, and Meneleidas, being jealous of the two chief movers, persuaded the people to add Charon's name to it, and to dedicate it in memory of the victory aforesaid. In the Lamian war (323) Leosthenes the Athenian defeated the Lacedaemonians in Boeotia and at Thermopylae, and shut up the garrison in Lamia, where he fell; a picture was put up in the joint temple of Athena and Zeus at Peiraeus, showing Leosthenes and his sons engaged in the fight. Olympiodorus, who raised the siege of Elatca (298), was honoured by a painting in Eleusis, perhaps votive. Porus is said to have dedicated in some Indian temple bronze tablets portraying the feats of Alexander. It will be remembered that Queen Matilda is supposed to have dedicated the famous tapestry in Bayeux cathedral after the conquest of England.

A fragment of a war scene in bronze repoussé was found at Dodona, but I hesitate to place it here as it was probably part of the bronze case of some other object. Similar friezes at Olympia bear warriors fighting. A war galley comes from Crete.

In Corinth, where painted pottery was made from an early day, the poor man seems to have had the means to make a dedication of this sort. At least, some of the sherds amongst the refuse of Poseidon's temple fall in place here quite naturally. There are pictures of Poseidon and Amphitrite, with other deities, common enough, although giving no clue to the occasion; but others represent Homeric combats, one of the motives as we have seen of the warriors' heroic precedents. Others again bear armed warriors, or two or more men fighting, or a battle-ship. These date from the sixth century or earlier, and there is no reason to suppose that they were not matcht at other places, such as Athens, where such things could be made. Archaic reliefs of warriors, in terra-cotta, come from Praesus in Crete, one leading a captive.

The following I would also interpret as a representation of the event. After Salamis, the Aeginetans dedicated at Delphi a bronze mast with three golden stars upon it. I can only suppose that St Elmo's fire had been seen on the ships, and that it was thus commemorated as a good omen1. One of Lysander's many offerings after Aegospotami was a pair of golden stars by him sent to Delphi, which may have had a similar origin2. Plutarch, who for a sceptical observer was singularly awake to portents, notes that these stars mysteriously disappeared before the battle of Leuctra.

Further, the story of the Corinthian women should be explained in the same way. It is said that when the Persians invaded Greece, the courtesans of Corinth went to Aphrodite's temple and prayed for the preservation of Greece. After the triumph the people dedicated a picture or a bronze group of the women in the same place, which we are to suppose was not a row of portraits, but the women in act of supplication3.

We have seen in sundry of the groups described, how the victorious general stood in the high company of gods and heroes. The sentiment which caused him to be included is not quite simple, and as the ancients have not themselves analyzed it we should be rash to jump to conclusions. There was a desire, no doubt, to show honour; but this was certainly not the main motive, as it was in honorific statues of later days. Demosthenes4 recognises the distinction quite clearly, when he says that Miltiades and Themistocles did not expect the honour claimed by latter-day captains; no bronze portrait statues were set up to them. The victory was not the captain's but belonged to the Athenian people; and a memorial portrait would have been out of place. And yet Miltiades was one of that Marathonian group which stood at Delphi; yet the figure was recognisable for the man. If then this figure is to be distinguisht from an ordinary portrait, the distinction lies not in the form but in the motive of dedication. Perhaps we may regard him as partly the personification of the fighting force, the armed conflict being as it were summed up in its leader appropriately arrayed; partly the intermediate instrument through which the god worked. The statue was a memorial, not an honour; just as the bronze ass, dedicated by the Ambraciots at Delphi, was to remind all men, how the god had used him as a humble instrument by his braying to reveal the ambush of their Molossian foes. But the essence of the moving idea was exprest by the group, and the single statues had no meaning.

If Miltiades then, and Tellias, Rhoeus and Daiphantes were to be seen in Delphi, the figures were not placed there as the portraits of great men. By the same principle we must judge of human statues when dedicated alone in the great age of Greece. Statues of Scyllis the renowned diver, and his daughter Hydra, who at the battle of Artemision were said to have dived under the sea, and cut the Persian cables, sending their ships adrift to destruction, were dedicated in Delphi by the Amphictyons.

ποιοῦσιν χάρων εἶχον; σφάδρα γε, ὃ ἀνδρεῖς Ἀθηναῖοι, καὶ ἀπεδίδοσαν γε καὶ αὐτῶν κάκεινων ἄξιοι· διότι γὰρ πολλοὶ πάντες ἄξιοι, προδερμοὶ ἐκεῖνοι αὐτῶν ἤγείρονται. ἔστι δὲ σῶφρονιν ἄνθρωποι, καὶ πρὸς ἀλήθειαν βουλομένοις σκοπεῖν, πολύ μελ·ξῶν τιμὴ τῆς χαλκῆς εἰκόνος τὸ καλὸν κάγαθῶν ἀνδρῶν κεκρίσθαι πρώτους. καὶ γὰρ τοῖς τῶν ἐργῶν τῶν τότε οὐδενὸς ἀπεστέρησαν ἑαυτοῖς· οὔτ' ἐστιν οὐδεὶς ὅστις ἄν εἴποι τὴν ἐν Σαλαμῖν ναυμαχίαν Θεομακτόκλεους, ἀλλ’ Ἀθηναῖοι, οὐδὲ τὴν Μαραθῶν μάχην Μιλτιάδου, ἀλλὰ τῆς πόλεως. νῦν δὲ πολλοὶ τούτῳ λέγουσιν, ὡς Κέρκυραν εἶλε Τιμόθεος, καὶ τὴν μόραν κατεκοψεν Ἰφικράτης, καὶ τὴν περὶ Νάξου ἑνίκα ναυμαχίαν Χαβρίας. When Pausanias claimed the victory of Plataea as his own, the Greeks would not have it: below, p. 147.

1 Paus. x. 18. 4.

2 Paus. x. 19. 1. Ziemann, p. 16, speaks of a statue of Euchidas, who ran to Delphi and back in one day for the sacred fire, and fell dead on the spot, quoting Plutarch, Arist. 20. But Plutarch says nothing of a statue, only that they buried him (ἐθαψαν) in the precinct of Artemis Eucleia.
The only possible memorial of this deed in the round were the figures of the divers, characterised no doubt in some way as doers of the deed. The same is true of any man who might be thought to have done more than a single man could do; and yet it is doubtful whether Greeks, with their keen sense of the fitting, would have done at that time what the Lydians did, in dedicating to Artemis a statue of one Adrastus, who fought against Xerxes as a volunteer in the Greek army, and fell fighting valiantly. Arimnestus it is true, who led the Plataean men-at-arms at Marathon and Plataea, was to be seen in the temple of Athena at Plataea, and he seems to have stood alone; if he was dedicated alone, it would seem that the centre of interest was shifting already, and that the great change was begun which in the next century was to make these dedications morally worthless. Why the statue of Phormio was dedicated, whether for his feats in the Gulf or for something else, is not stated.

Apart from these I can find no evidence for the dedication of the victorious general alone in the fifth century. But once human statues were dedicated for whatever cause, the motive of compliment was bound to come in sooner or later; and Lysander gives us the first distinct proof that the change had begun. When Poseidon is made to crown his figure in the memorial of Aegospotami, the human agent not the god becomes the centre of the composition. In the fourth century there are many statues of generals and other such on record. A portrait of Thrasybulus, soothsayer of the Mantineans when they fought against Agis, stood at Olympia. Iphicrates was set up by his grateful country, but not until long after his celebrated feat of arms. This distinguishnt honour became cheap with Alexander, if (as seems likely) he dedicated the statues he had caused to be made of four and thirty Greeks who fell at the Granicus (334). About the year 300 we find the statue of a certain Timagoras, who had commanded in a victorious sea-fight, dedicated at Astypalaea, nominally by Ares himself. Olympiodorus the Athenian, who raised the siege of Elatea when beset by Cassander (298), was honoured probably at this time by a bronze statue, which the Phocians dedicated at Delphi. There was also a statue of the same man on the Acropolis, and another in the Prytaneum, the former at least votive, dedicated no doubt after he had got rid of the Macedonian garrison in 288. The Phocian allies put up there also a statue of their own leader, Aleximachus, who in fighting against the invading Gauls (280) did all that valour could do, and fell. In 207 Philopoemen defeated and slew Machanidas, tyrant of Lacedaemon; for which deed the Achaeans dedicated a bronze statue of him in Delphi. In later days the dedication of a commander was a compliment for ordinary services, like that of an honorific crown. The base of a statue, dedicated by Hermolyceus, son of Diitrephes, "as a firstfruit," has been found; this cannot commemorate the wanton and horrible raid of Diitrephes mentioned by Thucydides, but must belong to some other event.

It is to be noted that none of the generals, not even Lysander, dedicates his own statue; that combination of vanity and impiety was reserved for creatures of Nero's kidney. It is not to be conceived, however, that they made no private acknowledgment of their victory or their deliverance; or that the private soldier, whose safety was not less momentous to himself than that of any captain who ever lived, should offer no thanks for this great event beyond a sacrifice at the altar. We do not know how far a private soldier felt bound to tithe his share of spoils which had been tithed in common; but if he was grateful enough he would not stop to count obols. The question now arises, What is the meaning of those figures of armed warriors so often found in ancient shrines: were they meant for the divinity, or for what?

We must first clear our minds of a misconception. The attributes of a Deity were not fixt by immutable laws; they express the conception in the worshipper's mind, which within certain limits might vary. If the deity be conceived as a protector, he will naturally be armed, as the heroes are, now with spears, now swords, now in panoply as Aphrodite and Athena. Although Zeus is from early times armed with the thunderbolt, yet he bears a helmet in Phrygia and a battle-axe in Caria, and there is no reason in the nature of things why he too should not have been represented in the panoply. If armed warrior figures, then, are dedicated to male deities, they may be meant for those deities. But the question takes a different turn when we see that such dedications are found in the shrines of female divinities, as of Athena and Aphrodite. Take this in conjunction with the rare figures in hunter costume, and with those of athletes, and it is clear that we may lawfully deny the warrior figures to be meant for the god.

It does not follow, however, that they were meant as portraits of the worshipper. The facts given in the last section go to show that for a worshipper to dedicate his portrait would be the height of arrogance. Moreover, one of these figures is dedicated by two men together. Neither can we fairly interpret them as a personification of the spirit of war, which, if not over-subtile, would at least fail to meet the case. We are supposing that the warrior wishes to commemorate his success in war as the act of his protecting deity; and his artistic expression being unequal to the task, he embodies the idea of successful war in the concrete figure of an armed warrior in act to strike. These figures are then less and more than portraits: they attempt to express the act which divine protection has blest.

The footman armed capapie is represented by a fine bronze statuette from Dodona, assigned to the year 600 or thereabouts. Another, but lacking the cuirass, was found in the precinct of Apollo Ptoan. Two warriors were unearthed in Olympia, and one at Selinus in Laconia, armed in the panoply: the last is dedicated to Apollo Meleatas. Another represents a naked bearded man, the hand uplifted to hold some weapon, and is dedicated by two persons in common to Apollo Ismenian. On the Acropolis of Athens were found several ancient figures of armed warriors, and statuettes of warriors were in Cyprus dedicated to the Paphian goddess, to Artemis, to Apollo at Golgi, and to deities unknown. Besides these clearly characterised figures, others of rude make and probably older still were found at Olympia, one in terra-cotta; others in the Idaean cave in Crete\(^1\), and in the shrine of Therapnae\(^2\). Armed riders are also known from the Temple of Athena in Calaurea\(^3\), and some of the Cyprian examples were mounted in chariots\(^4\). It is perhaps worth while suggesting the question whether some of the Olympian chariots may not have been war-offerings.

The same principle will explain a series of votive statues found on the Acropolis of Athens, which belong to the time of the Peisistratids. These are the so-called "Persian horsemen," clad in oriental costume, with soft cap and hose fitting tight to the leg. It has been pointed out that the costume is as much Scythian as Persian, and that the style is too early for the Persian wars\(^5\). It is more likely that they have to do with the rule of Miltiades and his family in the Thracian Chersonese. The romantic story of the first Miltiades, a Greek Rajah Brooke, his victories over the savages, and his marriage with a Scythian girl, seems to have caused intense excitement in Athens; Scythian caps became all the wear, and amongst other signs of the public interest we have the Miltiades plate, now at Oxford\(^6\), with a figure almost exactly like the Acropolis horsemen. The adventurers would naturally wear the dress of the natives, which was better suited than their own to the climate. The elder Miltiades we know commemorated one of his exploits by a dedication at Olympia\(^7\). Similarly these Horsemen may have been dedicated by some of the Scythian adventurers, perhaps in gratitude for a fortune gained in that flourishing colony. One base has been found with a fragmentary inscription\(^8\) placed on the small end, showing that the sculpture upon it was something of the shape of a horse, not a group; and in fact the base would fit the “Persian horseman." A similar dedication was made about 446 by a body of knights, who offered the statue of a horse or more probably a horseman out of the spoils.

A step further leads to personification of an abstract idea; and one expression of it, the statue of Victory, was especially common as a war-dedication, and is never before the fourth century found dedicated alone for anything else.

Hier sent a gold Victory to Delphi after the battle of Himera, and Gelo did the like. Diodorus relates that Hiero dedicated another for the Cumaean victory which has been already spoken of, but this may be the same statue. The most famous example of this class is the Victory of Paeonius, which was found at Olympia. The Messenians themselves declared it to be a thank-offering for their part in the capture of Sphacteria (425), and that the name was omitted from fear of the Spartans.

Mr Frazer suggests that it may have been erected after the Peace of Nicias (421), so that it should refer to the general result of the first period of the war: in that case, however, fear of Sparta would hardly have caused the omission of the name. The Athenians took a great pride in the capture of Sphacteria, and we need not wonder at finding that they dedicated a bronze Victory on the Acropolis\(^1\). If the wingless Victory, sent to Olympia by the Mantineans, was the work of Calamis, as Pausanias says, it cannot belong to this period, but otherwise it would be possible\(^2\). The magnificent Victory of Samothrace, now in the Louvre, was dedicated by Demetrius Poliorcetes for his victory of Salamis\(^3\): she stands poised on the prow of a great stone galley. Lysander commemorated his victories at Ephesus and Aegospotami by presenting two eagles with statues of Victory upon them to the temple of Athena the Worker at Sparta\(^4\). The ancient winged Victory by Archermus was dedicated in Delos by the Chians; on what occasion is not specified; probably, like all the rest, for a feat of war\(^5\).

The Athenian temple lists frequently mention golden Victories\(^6\). There were in Pericles' time no less than ten of these, each weighing about two talents; and it would seem these should have been made at some time when Athens was at the zenith of her power. It is fanciful to suggest, perhaps, that they were part of the imperial tribute, preserved thus against any time of need, and their shape determined by that abiding sense of victory over the barbarian which the Delian League kept ever fresh. Certainly they were most of them melted down before the end of the war. One was melted in 407\(^7\), and at the beginning of the next century only two of the old ones remain, but a new one appears, perhaps, as is suggested, made out of the goods of the thirty Tyrants\(^8\).

We have no hint of the occasion of these Victories; but although Eutychides and Timodemus are mentioned as dedicators, it seems unlikely that they can be really private offerings. The official who had to do with their casting might be said to dedicate them\(^1\). On the other hand, the small bronze Victories of the Acropolis\(^2\) may well have been private; and we are justified in counting them amongst dedications of war, for the reason given above.

Another aspect of the event is personified in the great statue of Nemesis at Rhamnus, carved (if the common tale be true) out of the very block which the Persians had intended for a statue of Victory\(^3\).

A third personification is the Lion. Heracles is said to have dedicated a stone lion which stood before the temple of Artemis Eucleia at Thebes, in commemoration of a victory over Orchomenus\(^4\). A stone lion was one of the statues found at Branchidae, which can hardly be but a war-tithe\(^5\). The Elateans, when Cassander was driven away from their walls by timely help (298), sent a bronze lion to Delphi\(^6\). The lion, placed on a cliff, overlooking the place where the battle of Cnidus was fought, probably marks the tomb where slain heroes rest; like the great lion of Chaeronea, which still guards the bones of those whom Philip slew\(^7\), or that other in Ceos which covers unknown dead\(^8\). It would appear from these instances that the lion laid stress not so much on the victory, as the courage of brave men, whether victors or vanquished; and the symbol has thus a pathos and nobility of its own, which sets it above the records of mere triumph and pride.

There is more than personification, there is a complete allegory, in what the Athenians sent to Delphi after the Eurymedon (469): a palm tree of bronze, with fruit upon it, a gilt Athena and a couple of owls being apparently perching on the branches\(^9\). This must surely imply that Athena and her favourite city were now possessors of the east and its riches. Plutarch notes that just before the Sicilian disaster, crows pecked off the fruit. So perhaps the horn of Amalthea, sent by Miltiades the elder to Olympia, after taking a city. Pausanias explains on a like principle why the Coreyreans and the Eretrians sent to Olympia, the Plataeans and the Carystians to Delphi, each a bronze ox, after the Persian wars; because, says he, they were now able to plow in peace. It would be more satisfactory to have the givers’ word for it, but the thing is not impossible. The Council of the Areopagus dedicated a bronze bull on the Acropolis, which, if it belongs to the same period, may have a similar reference to stock-breeding. But all five may be memorials of sacrifice. A distinct example of the sacrificial model is known as a war dedication. Orneae, having conquered Sicyon, in the heat of gratitude rashly vowed to institute in the god’s honour a daily procession at Delphi, and to sacrifice such and such victims; but this proving a burden upon them, they dedicated a bronze representation of the whole procession, victims and all, instead.

‘Tripods form a large class of war-dedications, and I have reserved them for this place because the motive of choice differs in different ages. Originally they are dedicated for their value; and this explains why in the first Messenian War (743—724), when the Messenians shut up in Ithome enquired of the Delphic oracle what they must do to prevail, the reply was, That whichever side should first dedicate a hundred tripods to Zeus of Ithome was to possess the Messenian land. The Messenians being too poor to make these of bronze in due form, proceeded to make images of them in wood; but meanwhile Oebalus a Spartan, a man of no mark but shrewd enough, made him a hundred tripods of clay, and having by stratagem got within the walls of Ithome, set these up before the god at dead of night. In this way the Spartans were victorious; and at the close of the war they used part of the spoils to procure three tripods, each having a statue beneath it, of Aphrodite, Artemis, and the Maid, which they dedicated to Apollo of Amyclae.

But in course of time the tripod became a traditional form of dedication, which endured long after the bronze article ceased to circulate. The beauty of its shape no doubt helped to keep the type in use; but that tradition had more to do with it, is clear from the miniature mock tripods and kettles which were found in great numbers at Olympia, some cut out of thin foil, others in model. But when they are made of gold the ornamental side becomes important. Tripods of gold were sent to Delphi after Himera by Hiero and Gelo both. An epigram by Simonides mentions the four brothers; and as four tripod bases have been found together, two of which are those of Hiero and Gelo, it is likely that all four did dedicate tripods, and that the first two eclipsed the more modest offerings of the others. A tripod of Hiero’s, sent to Delphi after the battle of Cumae (474), is also mentioned. Most famous of all votive tripods, and perhaps of all dedications, was the golden tripod bought from the Persian spoils, and set up at Delphi after Plataea had been fought and won. It stood on a bronze pedestal made of three snakes intertwining, and this seems to have been supported on a stone base which was found in the recent excavations. Pausanias had a couplet composed by Simonides, and engraved upon the base, as follows:

'Eλληνων ἀρχηγὸς ἐπεὶ στρατὸν ὅλεσε Μῆδων, Παυσανίας Φοίβῳ μνῆμ' ἀνέθηκε τόδε.

The Amphictyonic Council, incensed at his arrogance in claiming the victory of Greece for his own deed, caused this inscription to be erased, and the following to be put in its place:

'Eλλάδος εὐνοχόρου σωτήρες τόνδ' ἀνέθηκαν
δουλυτώνς στυγερᾶς ῥυσάμενοι πόλις.

At the same time they engraved on the writhing snakes the names of all those Greek states which had fought at Plataea or Salamis, thus changing the character of the monument which was originally a memorial of Plataea only. The golden part of the monument was carried off by the Phocians in the Sacred War; and the bronze column, which Pausanias saw on the spot, was taken by Constantine to his new city, where it still stands in the Hippodrome, broken and defaced. To the same period we may assign the marble group of Persians supporting a bronze tripod, which Pausanias saw in the Olympieum at Athens. A remarkable group of tripods is associated with Plataea. We have seen how great importance the Greeks attached to this victory, and how yearly sacrifices were decreed in memory of it. Part of the ceremony may have been the dedication of a magnificent tripod; but whether that be true of the fifth century or not, it appears that in the fourth and third centuries a board of seven magistrates was elected for the purpose of performing certain ceremonies, at the end of which they dedicated a tripod. Three of these dedications have been found, dedicating the tripod to Zeus Eleutherios at Plataea; one at Thespiae to the Muses; seven at Acræphiae to Apollo Ptoan; one at Orchomenus to the Graces. As the formula in each shows the dedication to be made in the name of the Boeotian community, we may perhaps fairly assume that the occasion was one, and that the place, and consequently the deity, varied for political reasons. To assume further that the memory of Plataea was the occasion, is to go beyond the evidence; but in default of a better explanation I would suggest it. Three tripods are mentioned as dedicated by Phormio on some occasion unknown, perhaps for one of his victories. Two bronze tripods were dedicated at Amyclae from the spoils of Aegospotami. Some Knights of Thespiae, sent home in 330 by Alexander, dedicated a tripod to Zeus, the inscription of which is preserved in the Anthology. Perhaps the Knights of Orchomenus, their companions, made the same offering to Zeus the Saviour, but it is not described.

One very artificial offering remains to be mentioned. Aristonous wrote a paean in commemoration of the repulse of the Gauls from Delphi, which was performed at the Soteria, a yearly festival of thanksgiving for the deliverance. This was engraved on a slab and set up in the Athenian treasury there, together with a list of honours decreed to the successful poet. This dedication has wandered far from the simple piety or thankfulness of earlier use, and is a mere method of self-glorification.

GAMES AND CONTESTS¹.

ATHLETIC games, races, and contests of other kinds are found amongst the Greeks from very early times. In Homer a chariot-race is spoken of as the natural thing to celebrate the death of a warrior². Hesiod visited the Games of Amphidamas in Chalcis, where many prizes were given, and himself won a tripod for victory in song³. In the historical period we find this competitive spirit expressed in the four great Games, which later sprouted into innumerable off-shoots⁴; whilst many cities had their own special games, as Athens had the Panathenaea. It is not our purpose to discuss the history of these ceremonials, but merely to consider how they were commemorated by votive dedications.

The prizes at these games were, according to the earliest records, articles of recognized value, but of many different kinds. Homer speaks of tripods, kettles, and slave-women as prizes⁵. Besides these, Pindar mentions vessels of gold⁶ and silver¹, articles of bronze². Bronze tripods were given in the Games of Heracles at Thebes³; a bronze shield at the Argive Heraea⁴, bronze articles in the Arcadian feast of Lycean Zeus⁵, a kettle often⁶, a crater at the Games of Aeacus in Aegina⁷; silver cups at the Heraeal of Marathon⁸; a cloak or frieze jerkin at Pellene⁹. One of the oldest inscriptions of Troezen records the winning of a tripod at Thebes¹⁰. A prize kettle for the long race is commemorated by an epigram in the Anthology¹¹. Apparently a cuirass was also given at Argos, if we may judge from a mutilated inscription¹². At the Panathenaea the prize was so many jars of oil made from the sacred olives, which only victors were allowed to take out of the country¹³. It will be noted that at Athens, Pellene, and Argos the prize was an article of local make¹⁴. The others, whether of local make or not, were given for their own value, not for any hidden meaning supposed to be implied by them; and the tripod must be included, for as we shall see below, it is not confined to one deity or one occasion. It is in fact given for wrestling in the Iliad, and appears on a Corinthian tablet between two men-at-arms; on vase-paintings it stands as the prize for chariot-races and other races, and for boxing and wrestling. The tripod continued to be given as the traditional prize for the lyrical chorus at Athens, long after its origin was forgotten. It was also given at the Panathenaea. In the great games no prizes were given but the wreath of glory; but in local games prizes of value continued to be the rule. Money was given at the Salaminian boat-race, weapons and other articles at Delos; at the Panathenaea a gold crown for the harpist, a hydria for the torch-racer, an ox for the pyrrhic chorus; at the Pythia a gold crown for the city which sent the finest sacrificial ox; fine arms and armour or golden crowns for soldiers' sports: these are a few examples.

We may divide the offerings in this chapter into three classes: (1) The Prize, (2) The Instrument, (3) Other Commemorative Offerings.

1. The Prize.

On the same principle which suggested the consecration of war-spoils, the victor often made an offering of his prize. There is no trace of this custom in Homer, although one of the Delphic tripods was traditionally ascribed to Diomede, who should have won it at the funeral games of Patroclus. Hesiod however brings back his prize from Chalcis and dedicates it appropriately enough to the Muses of Helicon, where they first made him master of the singer's craft. In the temple on Helicon Hesiod's reputed tripod was to be seen, and perhaps the obviously spurious epigram, preserved in the Anthology, was engraved upon it. Others were there also, some of which may have been prizes. In the first Pythian Games prizes appear to have been given; and a tripod (perhaps one of them) was dedicated to Heracles at Thebes by the Arcadian musician Echembrotus. Of the sixth century, or earlier, is the Athenian dedication of a tripod won for tumbling or juggling. A bronze kettle, of which a fragment was found on the Acropolis, appears to have been dedicated as a prize; this comes probably from the sixth century: and a tripod is named in another dedication. From the fifth century we have a tripod dedicated at Dodona by a rhapsode Terpsicles. Herodotus mentions a tripod at Thebes the offering of a victorious pugilist. By Herodotus' day it was a matter of course with victors in the Triopia to offer their prize tripods to Apollo; indeed they were not allowed to take them out of the precinct. Many tripods have been found, whole and in fragments, at Athens, Delos, Delphi, Dodona, Olympia, and elsewhere; but without inscriptions we cannot assign them to any particular occasion.

The musical prize in Sparta was an iron object, part of the ceremonial headgear, and named στήλεγγις from its likeness to the body-scraper. There are dedications of these to Artemis Orthia, and one of them still remains fixt in the stone. A strigil now in the British Museum was a prize; and many such are mentioned in the Athenian and Delian inventories, which, like Xenophon's gold ones, may have been the same. Bronze vessels, or other prizes, may have stood on certain bases with dedicatory inscriptions of torch-race runners, but there is nothing to prove it. One of these bases has round holes, as if for torches; and torches, or torch-holders, appear to have been dedicated as prizes, at least there is one such dedication to Hermes and Heracles from the second century after Christ. In the third century B.C. Straton a flotist won a prize, which he dedicated in Thespiae; and a harpist appears to have dedicated his in Athens. The Argive shield is modelled in relief as late as the age of Hadrian. Other dedications of prizes are recorded, whose nature is not known. Such are the torch-racer's prize to Hermes and Heracles at Byzantium, the harpist's to Apollo and the Muses in Cos\textsuperscript{1}, and a third from some unknown contest in Aegae\textsuperscript{2}. Even perishable wreaths may have been dedicated, as the Cretan Alcon did at the Isthmia\textsuperscript{3}, the soldiers of Agesilaus did with theirs at their friendly contests in Ephesus\textsuperscript{4}. In a Delian temple-inscription is a long list of articles handed on from archon to archon, and apparently votive offerings; all are goblets of the different kinds mentioned among the temple treasure: since a list of victors in the artistic contests is also given, it looks as though these might be prizes\textsuperscript{5}. In the list for the year 364 we find ποτήρια χορεία, φιάλη νικοδόμειος, and eleven silver goblets, which had been prizes in the horse-race\textsuperscript{6}.

We have seen that the panathenaic amphorae are mentioned as early as Pindar, who speaks of the “fruit of the olive in gaily bedeckt jars”\textsuperscript{7}.” These jars have been found in many places, a large number of them in Etruria, others in Cyrene, in the Crimea, and in various parts of Greece\textsuperscript{8}. The oldest existing specimen bears the inscription, in archaic script, τῶν Ἀθηναίων ἄθλων εἰμί: the goddess, armed with helmet, shield, and spear, and clad in the embroidered peplos, stands turned to the left, brandishing the spear, and holding the shield so as to show the device upon it\textsuperscript{9}. owl, a panther, a Victory, a figure of Athena herself. On the reverse of the vase is another scene, generally agonistic. As fragments of these jars have been found on the Acropolis, it is natural to suppose the winners, who received a certain number of jars for each victory, sometimes offered one to Athena. Perhaps they also dedicated the prize at home: at least, one victor in the Eleusinia offered something in Lesbos, and on the inscribed slab is carved an amphora and olive leaves; and a panathenaic amphora was found at Eleusis. One such vase appears to be dedicated to Asclepius.

The golden crowns and the like, won in public contests, were sometimes consecrated. In the Panathenaea a crown was the reward of musical contests, which by Pericles were added to the list of events. Xenophon relates how athletic and military competitions were held for the army of Agesilaus at Ephesus; among the prizes were fine arms and golden crowns. There are a large number of gold crowns in the Athenian inventories, but few can be identified. In the Delian lists one donor is Xenophantus, whom Homolle identifies with the famous flotist. There are some fifty gold crowns mentioned in the list; myrtle crowns are dedicated by the Delian girls as the prize of dancing. One laurel crown bears the name of Nicias. The state is also found dedicating a victor's crown. Nero, who was nothing if not a mimic, dedicated in the Argive Heraeum a golden crown and a purple robe; the first doubtless a musical prize, the latter the dress he performed in. So also he sent to Olympia a golden crown.

The most important series of prizes thus dedicated, are the tripodds awarded for the best tribal chorus at the Dionysia and cyclic chorus at the Thargelia. The origin of the form has been spoken of; here it remained as an honorific prize, its very type, its shape and size, the ornamental lion-claws and so forth, being traditional. In the vase paintings, it should be noted, there seems always to be a kettle too. This tripod is usually represented as being taller than a man. Ever since the tribal competition was establisht by Cleisthenes the tripod seems to have been the only prize; there is clear evidence for the fifth century and for the fourth. Simonides mentions fifty-six tripods won by his choruses. In the earlier part of the fourth century we find the usual victors’ records of choregi; but as the city became poorer, the choregia had to be shared between two or more, whose names appear jointly as victors. By the end of this century the burden appears to have grown too great for private citizens, and the state takes it over, placing the celebration in the hands of a public official, the Agonothet. This reform is ascribed to Demetrius of Phalerum, who presided at the Dionysia in 309/8. The records after this date are not full, but we find dedications in the second century. Outside Attica we have no means of knowing how far the choregic customs prevailed; but there are traces of such dedications at Eretria in Euboea, at Orchomenus, and elsewhere. The practice seems to have died out for a time, perhaps for lack of musical talent. After the Christian era the competition seems to have been artificially revived. The Thargelian contest ceases to have importance as early as the fourth century.

Originally the Dionysiac tripods were dedicated in the precinct of Dionysus, and the Thargelian in the Pythium. But when there was no longer room, or the choregus became more ambitious, they were set up in a street close by called after them The Tripods. The state used to pay a thousand drachmae towards the cost; but the opportunity for magnificence or display was not neglected by the choregus, and thus the offering partook of both public and private character. They were placed on a plain basis, or on steps, or on a pillar, like that of Aristocrates, which is still preserved. It seems probable, as Reisch suggests, that the three-sided marble bases, with concave sides, some inscribed, some bearing Dionysiac reliefs, even tripods, were intended to carry votive tripods. Nicias would seem to be the first who made the base of a 7 CIA ii. 814 a ΛΑβὶς τρίποδες νικήτηρα τῶν χοροίς καὶ τῶν ἐργασάμενων (375/4). Theoretically, the offering was therefore public; but practically private. This feeling is perhaps express by the change of formula from the tribal name to the choregus', ὁ δὲ οὐκ ἀρτι χορηγῶν ἕνικα: cp. CIA ii. 553 (400 n.c.), 1234, and later. The choregus is victor in the Thargelia, CIA i. 422, Aristocrates, whose offering is mentioned in Plato, Gorgias 472 a (below, p. 158 s). See the vases figured in Reisch, pp. 68, 80. tripod something more than a base. Plato alludes to the tripod of Nicias and his brothers in the Dionysium, and to the "beautiful offering" of Aristocrates¹; and the words of Plutarch² imply that those of Nicias were placed upon some kind of a shrine, on the gable top and ends perhaps. Whether or no Nicias may claim to be the inventor of the tripod shrine, the latter half of the fourth century saw a number of these erected in the Street of Tripods, of which the beautiful monument of Lysicrates (335/4) still remains on the spot³. The tripod stood probably on the trefoil ornament, and the frieze, which represents scenes from the life of Dionysus, was doubtless taken from the prize poem. A similar monument, called the Lantern of Diogenes, is described by a traveller as standing in 1669⁴. Another choreic inscription (of the year 323/2) is carved on a piece of a Doric epistyle⁵. The well-known monument of Thrasyllos, who won a victory with the men's chorus in 320/19, was placed against the Acropolis rock over the theatre, and there its remains are still⁶; a second Nicias won with the boys' chorus in the same year, and built a little Doric shrine for his tripod above the Odeum⁷. The agonothetae probably continued the practice of the choregi, as we see from a similar inscription on the fragments of an Ionic architrave⁸, and there is evidence for similar buildings in the imperial age⁹.

The tripods themselves were sometimes covered with silver, as that of Aeschaeus in the fourth century; and some of them had statues enclosed between the legs. The suggestion came doubtless from ornamenting the pillars, which as we have seen stood below the belly of the cauldron for support.

Praxiteles placed his famous Satyr under one of the tripods in this street. A Dionysus, with Victory by his side, made by the same artist and doubtless dedicated by him, is alluded to in the following lines:

\[ \text{εἰ καὶ τις προτέρων ἐναγαγὼι Ἐρμῆι ἔρεξεν} \\
\text{ιερά, καὶ Νίκην τοιάδε δῶρα πρέπει,} \\
\text{ἡν πάρεδρον Βρομίωι κλεινοῖς ἐν ἀγώσι τεχνιτῶν} \\
\text{Πραξιτέλης δισσοῖς εἰσαθ' ὕπο τρίποσιν.} \]

Perhaps the group of Apollo and Artemis slaying the Niobids, seen by Pausanias, was there placed. One Praxiteles placed statues of Victory under two tripods, probably for musical victories. A similar tripod, with Dionysus beneath it, is mentioned in the Anthology as dedicated by Damomenes the choregus. The practice is illustrated by a marble tripod found at Magnesia on the Maeander, which has Hermes between the legs. A portion of what seems to be the marble base of a tripod is preserved in Madrid: it is three-sided, and there remain two graceful figures of dancing girls. Three dancing figures of a similar type found at Delphi seem to have adorned a tripod base.

But this may mean "in the grotto"; it can hardly mean, as Reisch suggests, they were ornamental work on the tripod, which Pausanias expresses by ἐπειραγαμένοις. Perhaps the scene was taken later by Christians to mean devils attacking the Virgin, and hence the modern consecration of the grotto to Our Lady of the Cave, Speleotiosa.

The model of a tripod in stone was dedicated at Tremithus in Cyprus, apparently by the winner\(^1\).

As the victorious warrior might consecrate his own arms, so the athlete might do with the implement of his game. This class, like the corresponding class in the last chapter, is smaller than the preceding; but there is evidence for it from either extreme of Greek history, which may throw light on the obscurity which lies between. At the same time, quite a number of competitions are by their nature excluded. Singing choirs used nothing which would suggest an offering; the pentathlete had his quoit, his weights, his javelin, but the runner had nothing to show; neither had the hoplite, who for obvious reasons must not run in his own armour\(^2\). It is in fact the contest of quoit-throwing, or putting the weight, which is most useful to us just at this point.

In Olympia is a huge irregular stone, declaring by an inscription that Bybon threw it over his head with one hand\(^3\). We know that the stone was used in putting before quoits came in\(^4\); and although this has no dedicatory inscription, the place of its finding implies that it stood in the holy place. We cannot feel quite certain about the quoit called of Iphitus, on which was engraved the formula of the sacred truce\(^5\). But a very ancient bronze quoit from Cephallenia is inscribed with words which leave no doubt\(^6\):

A thousand years later we find a quoit dedicated as a thank-offering by Publius Asclepiades in the year 241 of our era\(^7\).

Again, a victorious pentathlete of the sixth century dedicates at Athens a base with a flat circular depression, which may have held a quoit. What more natural, then, than to assume that two quoits, engraved with scenes from the five events, either were votive or represented a votive type? Both represent the jump and the javelin, which with the quoit were therefore the three events which the owner won. One is from Sicily, and is dated about 500; the other, found in a tomb in Aegina, belongs to the fifth century. These, or such as these, may be models made for memorial or dedication. Several discs, not inscribed, were found at Olympia, which are most likely to be votive.

To the same class belongs the leaden jumping weight of Epaenetus, found at Eleusis. There was a stone weight found at Olympia inscribed with a name, but without a dedication. Two weights were found at Corinth, but without inscription. I do not know whether we ought to call votive the stone flute found in Ithaca.

If Arcesilas IV of Cyrene, who won the Pythian race in 466, did as it seems dedicate the car he drove in, this would be another example of the same principle. Euagoras did so at Olympia; and perhaps we may take it that this was the earliest, as it is the most natural, custom.

Trappings of horses have been found at Dodona, Olympia, and elsewhere, but to assign these to any special class would be guessing.

But in the fifth century the victor in musical and scenic contests dedicated the trappings of his work. Lysias speaks of the dedication of stage trappings by the choregus; and an inscription of Teos mentions the masks and the crowns. A fragment of Aristophanes alludes to the "bogie-masks" hanging in the precinct of Dionysus; and a number of reliefs from the Athenian theatre show tragic masks suspended in rows. The masks appear to have been either hung on the walls, or placed on their own bases. Such reliefs may have been themselves votive, just as a trophy might be made in permanent form of bronze; or they may simply reproduce the appearance of the temple walls with real masks hanging upon them. The dedication of the real mask comes first in point of development, although since this class of dedication does not appear until the practice of dedicating models had begun, there is nothing to show which kind, if either, comes first in time. A large number of model masks are preserved; Sybel notes about thirty of them in Athens\(^1\), and the practice will doubtless have been followed elsewhere. A fine tragic mask of terracotta, with holes for hanging, came from Thebes\(^2\). A disc, of the Roman period, made for hanging, bears on one side two Bacchic masks, and on the other a Satyr\(^3\).

A few other examples may be mentioned. Athenaeus alludes to a Contest of Beauty which Cypselus founded in honour of Eleusinian Demeter, in which his own wife was the first victor\(^4\). In a poem of the Anthology a victorious maiden offers as trophies of such a contest a fawn-skin and a golden vase, together with her dress and trinkets, to Priapus\(^5\). The athletic and equestrian contests gave good scope for those representations in modelling. The chariot with its team and driver, the race-horse and jockey, and the athlete with distinguishing marks or attitudes were at once simple as conceptions and effective as memorials. An ideal element was often added to the chariot by placing a statue of Victory beside the driver.

The earliest dedication of the chariot-model recorded by Pausanias is probably that of Cleosthenes the Epidamnian, victor in 516¹. He and his driver stood in the car, and he went so far as to inscribe the names of the horses upon them. Gelo, despot of Gela and afterwards of Syracuse, won the race and dedicated a similar group in 488². The chariot of Hiero, who succeeded him, was dedicated at Olympia by his son³; and the remains of a magnificent monument found at Delphi testify to a Pythian victory for the same man. It is a bronze charioteer, with the wreath of victory on his head, and parts of the horses⁴. Others recorded are those of Cratisthenes the Cyrenian⁵, and of Cynisea, daughter of Archedamus of Sparta⁶. Cratisthenes was probably the first to place a Victory beside the driver⁷; but in other cases appears a "maiden" who is probably meant for this personification⁸. Pliny mentions another, that of Tisicrates, by Piston⁹; and probably the ἵπποι χαλκαί of Cimon, said by Aelian to have been in Athens, were the memorial of a successful race¹⁰. Calamis, Aristides, and Euphranor, as well as Lysippus, Euthycrates, Pyromachus, Menogenes, and Aristodemus, made well-known chariot-groups, some of which we may assume to have been votive. Quite late, the chariot of Lampus of Philippi in Macedon is mentioned 1.

These models we may assume to have been full size, but others were small. That Glaucon the Athenian’s chariot was small is proved by its base, which has been found 2. Cynisca also placed a small chariot in the ante-chapel at Olympia 3, and the car of Polypeithes the Laconian was “not large 4.” What may be the wheel of one such model was found, it is said, in Argos, and it is dedicated to the Dioscuri 5. Fragments of chariots and drivers were found at Athens 6. A number of smaller models in bronze and terra-cotta were found at Olympia 7, so many indeed, and such trifles, as to suggest a doubt whether they can be meant for this great event. Can it be that such things were offered beforehand with the propitiatory sacrifice? I know of no evidence for this, however. A number of wheels were found which had no chariots belonging to them; they are cut out of thin foil 8, or cast 9, most being of the four-spoke type, but two, the wheels of the mule-car 10, with five spokes. All are older than the traditional founding of the Games. It may be that some are the bases of animal figures 11, but this will not help with the rest. Reisch believes that they were dedicated for the whole car by a convention, and so explains also the Argive wheel mentioned above. If the Greeks could have dedicated a wheel for a chariot, they could have dedicated the leg of a tripod for the whole; and there is no evidence whatever that they ever made such an artistic blunder. They might restore Heracles from a foot, but they would hardly offer a foot for Heracles. I shall offer another explanation of these wheels by and by.

Turning to the horse-race, we find figures of jockeys on horseback placed on either side of Hiero's chariot. We learn that Canachus, Hegias, and Calamis made such groups. Crocon the Eretrian was another who dedicated his horse, and although no jockey is mentioned he would be necessary to express the idea we have seen in these groups. There is one example of the animal dedicated alone, but then there was a reason for it. At the outset of this race the jockey who was riding Pheidolas's mare fell off, yet the mare ran on and came in first; so Pheidolas was adjudged victor, and was allowed to dedicate his mare alone. But the animal is singled out for special honour in another Olympian victory of the sons of Pheidolas. Other victorious jockeys are thus represented; as Aesypus who rode for his father Timon. These statues might also be dedicated at home; the base of Onatas on the Athenian Acropolis seems to have borne some such group. Whether the equestrian statue of Isocrates was dedicated for a race, or for some athletic contest, is not stated: but there it stood on the Acropolis of Athens\(^1\). Statuettes of riders were found at Delos\(^2\) and Olympia\(^3\), one at Dodona on a galloper\(^4\), a galloping and a walking or trotting horseman at Athens\(^5\), an archaic jockey in Argos\(^6\), a youth in the attitude of riding at Megara Hyblaea\(^7\). Horses alone are quite common as votive offerings, as has been pointed out: in the Cabirium there were riders also\(^8\).

When we come to the statues of athletes, we are met by a very puzzling question. The athlete, we are told, was allowed to dedicate a statue of himself for each victory; the girl runners at the Heraea, pictures of themselves painted\(^9\). The question is, whether these were really votive offerings, or nothing but an honour done to the winner.

Now Pausanias says distinctly that whilst all the objects on the Athenian Acropolis were votive, statues included, the athlete statues at Olympia were not; but that, as a kind of prize, the right of dedicating them was given\(^10\). Since in the time of Pausanias ἀνατιθέναι and ἀνάθημα were used of honorific statues, it is likely that he got this distinction from an earlier writer\(^11\). It is true also that the inscriptions on many of these statues are not dedicatory\(^12\), that the right to erect one was held to be a high honour, and that this fact is sometimes stated or implied in the legend. On the other hand, we have seen that it was a recognised principle to make the votive offering a representation of the event; and this could be done for athletes by showing them in some characteristic attitude or holding characteristic attributes. There is therefore nothing in the nature of things to prevent the athlete dedicating in the true sense such a figure of himself. Further, some of the athlete statues have true dedicatory inscriptions; and the chariot groups are admitted to be truly votive.

Furtwängler (AM v. 29 ff.) and Curtius (Inschr. von Ol. p. 235) agree with this view. Reisch p. 35 regards all as votive, because they stood in the precinct. This misses the point which I have tried to bring out in the text, that the motive was changing. Moreover, a thing might belong to the god and yet not be a votive offering.

The truth seems to be, then, that some athlete statues were votive and some were not. Here in fact is the earliest beginning of that change which is completed in the fourth century, by which the votive offering becomes chiefly a means of self-glorification. Why the change should begin here is easy to see. Victors in the chariot-race did not owe their victory to themselves alone; horses, car, and driver had a share in it, and the group was distinct from the owner: but the athlete stood alone, and in his case to represent the deed in doing was to represent the man. The inevitable result was that pride swallowed up piety, and in the fifth century or even earlier the athlete’s statue became a memorial of a personal honour.

I take it then, that originally the Olympian athlete statues were as truly votive as the chariot groups or race-horse and rider, and as truly as athlete statues continued to be votive which the victor dedicated at home. Pliny gives a hint in the same direction, when he implies that they were generally not realistic portraits. But those actually recorded must be divided into two distinct classes, those which are votive being

3 Yet two chariot-victors, Timon and Telemachus, seem to have dedicated their own statues alone: perhaps the effect of the athletes (Paus. vi. 2. 8. 13. 11). Diogenes Laertius i. 7. 3 says that Periander offered a golden statue of himself: "Εφορος ιστορεὶ ὡς εξαιτω, εἰ νικήσεων 'Ολυμπία τεθριππυ, χρυσῶν ἀνδριάντα ἀναθέωνα"

inscribed to that effect. If the dedicatory was content to describe his statue as a votive offering, I am content to take him at his word, without assuming that he would say what he did not mean, because like a fourth-form schoolboy he wanted to make his verses scan\(^1\).

One of the few that remained truly thankful for his mercies was Euthymus the boxer, who won his third Olympic victory in 472\(^2\). He is however not unmindful of his own pride, but another boxer Damarchus is more modest\(^3\). The same formula is used of Tellon in the fifth century\(^4\), and of Milo the wrestler\(^5\). These are the mainstays of my argument; but I may add Cyniscus\(^6\) from the early fourth century, after which no others demonstrably\(^7\) use the formula until the first century\(^8\), when the practice becomes general\(^9\).

If the principle of dedication which I have adopted is correct, the dedicatory statues must have been intelligible to the chance beholder. And in fact so were those which are minutely described. Damaretus, the first victor in the hoplite race, was armed with shield, helmet, and greaves\(^1\). Glaucus was in the attitude of sparring\(^2\); Diagoras had the left hand guarding the mark, the right uplifted\(^3\). The base of Athenaeus the boxer shows that he was in the act of striking\(^4\). The knuckle-dusters or thongs of cow-hide bound on the hand (\(\iota \mu \alpha \nu \tau \varepsilon \\nu s\)) also served to make out the boxer, as in the case of Arcesilaus\(^5\). Tisicrates the pancratist was represented as boxing\(^6\). The wrestler Xenocles was apparently poised as about to grip\(^7\). Other motives are possible: as the luctator anhelans of Nauceros. The leaper, or pancratist, might hold the leaping-weights\(^8\); the discobolus holds or hurls his quoit, the doryphorus his spear. The racer might be crouching down to prepare for the start\(^9\). More general attributes would be the hand upheld in prayer for victory, the oil-flask\(^10\), the wreath\(^11\), and the palm of victory\(^12\).

It would serve no purpose here to enumerate the statues we know of, from the wooden figures of Praxidamas and Rhexibius down to the age of Hadrian\(^13\); for without inscriptions we have no clue to guide us as to the motives of the dedicator. But it is fair to assume that statues in the attitude of adoration were really votive. In this attitude were Anaxandrus, victor in the chariot-race\(^1\), and Diagoras and Acusilaus the boxers\(^2\). There is a bronze boy in Berlin, holding up one hand in prayer, and with the other holding a leaping-weight\(^3\). If it could be shown that this attitude was taken by any other of the athlete statues, we should have to alter our view of them; but we do not know how far it was customary\(^4\).

At Delphi, the wider religious interest eclipsed the games; and neither there nor on the Isthmus, nor at Nemea, did Pausanias think it worth while to go into detail. A great many of the Olympic victors did however win also at one or more of the other three places, and we may shortly hope to be in a position to judge how the monuments at Delphi are to be regarded. Statues were, however, not infrequently set up at home for victories abroad. Callias in the fifth century stood upon the Athenian Acropolis, and the inscription may confidently be taken as votive\(^5\). There were also Hermolycus the pancratiast\(^6\), and Epicharinus, who won the hoplil race\(^7\). Promachus of Pellene\(^8\), and Aenetus of Amyclae\(^9\), had statues dedicated at home. Agias the pancratiast was honoured in the same way in his Thessalian home\(^10\). The man “in the helmet” in the Athenian Acropolis may have been a hoplil racer\(^11\). The victor’s portrait is spoken of as a matter of course in the fourth century\(^12\).

It does not seem to have been the custom to dedicate musical victors in this way. The statues which existed at Delphi\(^1\) do not appear to have been votive in the true sense; and the same may be said of heralds and trumpeters\(^2\). There were statues of poets or musicians in Mount Helicon who won the prize there, and an epigram of the fifth century which was on one of them is votive in form\(^3\). The relief of Pythocritus the flotist in Olympia is also uncertain\(^4\). The pretty tale of the cicala is worth mentioning. A musician broke his string, and a cicala settling upon the lyre buzzed the note of the broken string so well that he gained the prize. An image of the little creature was dedicated in remembrance of this timely help\(^5\).

Some of the statuettes found at Olympia appear to have been athletes, and these are certainly votive. One naked youth held an object in each hand, perhaps leaping-weights\(^6\); others, with one foot advanced, are not clearly characterised\(^7\).

figure called the Tübingen bronze. At Delphi was found a very ancient statuette of bronze, girt in a loincloth, the hands clenched as though holding something; which may be meant for a runner.

Pictorial representations of the act or process appear to have been common, although we hear little of them. Some such are upon the Corinthian tablets dedicated to Poseidon: a pair of pugilists, riders, and what not. There is a vase which shows a youth, carrying a Panathenaic vase and a tablet on which a human figure is painted; one was held in the hand of a statue which used to be at Olympia. I do not know whether we might venture to explain the scenes on some Athenian tablets which remain as due to mythological precedent; otherwise the apotheosis of Hercules might be used by some one who could claim connexion with him, to indicate labours accomplisht. The painter Nicomachus made a scene of Victoria quadrigam in sublime rapiens, in which Victory seems to have been driving, and holding a palm. Nothing but a more florid group would suffice the imagination of Alcibiades, who dedicated two pictures in the Pinacotheca. In one, Olympias and Pythias were crowning him; in the other, Nemea was sitting with him upon her knees. One is reminded of Pindar’s phrase that the victor “falls at the knees of Victory.” A similar picture, apparently the memorial of a race, is described by Pliny: Nemea palm in hand is seated upon a lion, and by her side stands an old man with a staff, over whose head hangs a picture or tablet with a two-horse car upon it.

I must not omit to mention that the scene of the contest, or something connected with it, is sometimes depicted upon the prize (as in a Panathenaic vase, and perhaps the quoits of Sicily and Aegina), or upon the base which supported the offering. An archaic base from the Athenian Acropolis shows a four-horse car, one from Aegina the pair-car; others show the Pyrrhic dance. The well-known base of Bryaxis (4th century), which once upheld the memorial of the Athenian contest in horsemanship (ἀνθιππασία), was dedicated by a father and two sons. Upon it the hipparch is seen advancing at full gallop to receive the prize, a large tripod. A boy on a race-horse appears elsewhere.

But reliefs independently dedicated form a very large class, which I cannot here do more than indicate in its main features. The interpretation of details, the fixing of the occasion, and so forth, is still mainly a matter of guess. The publication of the whole mass in some handy form would probably make it possible to advance a step or two further. Meanwhile, it is encouraging to see that most of the existing reliefs fall into certain main categories, and that these fit in with what we see elsewhere.

Taking the pieces which seem to be agonistic, we may divide them threefold: (i) The Contest, (ii) The Victory and Prize, (iii) The Sacrifice or Libation. Each is a different aspect of the act or process blest by the deity.

We shall take first athletic and equestrian contests, and secondly those relating to music or the drama.

(i) The Contest. Part of a chariot and pair in full course, found at Cyzicus, is ascribed to the sixth century; but there is no proof that it is votive. Archaic reliefs of the Acropolis show similar scenes, one with a shielded person who may perhaps be an apobates. There is no doubt in the case of a remarkable Spartan monument. Damophon, who has won a number of victories, several of them with the same team, dedicates to Athena a pillar recording the victories, with a relief of himself driving his quadriga.

A group of athletes has also been found with names inscribed. There are representations of Pyrrhic dancers and of victors in the torch-race. Some of the scenes are explained as referring to victorious apobatae, since the driver is armed. The scene may depict various moments of the contest or its conclusion. Here the driver is mounting upon his car or driving at speed in the race; or the steeds move at a moderate pace, before the start or after the finish. A more solemn pace is seen in a tablet from Palermo. Or again, a boy gallops past on his racer. Lads leading horses, perhaps victorious ephebes, appear on one Attic relief; a mounted boy on another. A horseman leading a group of other horsemen may refer to the anthippassia. A puzzling relief shows two male figures seated, of heroic size, betwixed whom is a lad leaning upon a spear, and apparently holding the jumping weights.

(ii) The Victory and the Prize. The moment of victory is anticipated, when Victory throws a wreath on the driver's head as he mounts, or flies through the air to place the crown on the victor's head, he driving at full speed the while; or upon the head of a victorious steed. Victory herself may even drive the chariot, or the victor wears a fillet upon his brow. The quadriga, and apparently Victory in it, appears on a curious relief dedicated to Hermes and the Nymphs, from Phalerum. Perhaps the deity offers a winged Victory to her worshipper, or Victory holds a fillet over his brow. There again stands the prize by the hurrying chariot; an amphora in one relief, a tripod perhaps in another. Even the votive tablet appears to be depicted in the left-hand corner of the Oropus relief. The judge crowns the victorious runner in the torch-race, whilst three athletes are grouped near by; or the whole troupe of runners. A fine relief in the British Museum shows a company of eight naked youths headed by two men droned, one of whom offers a torch to the statue of Artemis Bendis.

An Athenian relief assigned to the fifth century combines Types i. and ii. There are two divisions: below are fragments of two horses; above, a man as it were engaged in sacrifice.

(iii) The Sacrifice. I know of no instance which distinctly refers to athletic or equestrian contests, although some of those in which Victory appears may be such. The class of sacrificial relief is, however, very large, and as a rule the occasion is not clearly indicated.

We now come to the musical and scenic class, for which direct evidence is scanty. That some dedication was customary in the fourth century is clear from what Theophrastus says of the Mean Man. "When he wins a prize at the tragedies," says Theophrastus, "he is content to offer a wooden slab to Dionysus, with his own name upon it."

Plutarch tells us that Themistocles dedicated a πίναξ τῆς νίκης, inscribed; and the same word is used by Aristotle of the victory of Thrasippus. Simonides also alludes to a dedicatory πίναξ which he finally offered after winning fifty-six prizes. Now the word πίναξ may be used of an inscribed slab and no more, and we know that the yearly victories were recorded on such slabs. But on the other hand, this was done officially, and our authorities refer to the victor's dedication. Moreover, πίναξ is so often used of reliefs or paintings, that we may assume some such memorial was meant here. At all events, there exist still a certain number of reliefs whose subjects are connected with the stage; and we may provisionally take these to be the votive offerings of victorious composers, or perhaps actors.

(i) The Contest. There is a work apparently of Roman date, which however seems to imply an earlier Greek original, where we see a man crowned with ivy and clad in stage costume and buskins, seated upon a kind of throne, and holding a sceptre in his right hand. On one side is a boy playing upon the flute; on the other what seems to be a dancing girl. Another is a relief in the Lateran. Here a young man, apparently a portrait figure, sits on a chair, holding a mask in one hand, while on the table before him lie two other masks and a roll of manuscript. A woman stands beside him in the attitude of declamation. A variant of this type shows the artist gazing

(ii) The Victory and the Prize. A certain number of Athena reliefs may belong to this class. The goddess sets a garland upon a man’s head; she is armed, standing or seated, sometimes with her owl fluttering near, and worshippers are present. Similar scenes with armed men may represent the victorious hoplite-races. Hints of the same origin, in the case of the wreath, appear on Dioscuri reliefs from Tarentum. A relief-fragment from Athens shows a bearded man beside a gigantic tripod, which should be regarded as a choregic offering, or perhaps the poet’s own; doubtless the offering of the bull, so often coupled with the tripod on vase paintings, occupied the missing part of the scene. In yet another scene, beside the man whom we may regard as the poet and dedicator is a bearded satyr, who places the tripod upon a base: the satyr may be a personification of the dithyramb, as such a one is inscribed on a certain vase. A boy holding a palm is seen on a late relief standing beside a grown man and a herm.

(iii) The Sacrifice or Libation. The so-called Harpist Reliefs are perhaps memorials of a musical victory. On one of these the scene is laid before a temple; Apollo, holding the lyre in one hand, with the other reaches a bowl towards Victory, who standing beside an altar pours from a jug into the bowl. Artemis and Leto follow the god. One found in Euboea, near a shrine of Artemis, bears Artemis, Leto, and Apollo with a male worshipper. Much the same type is seen in the rest of this class. An Attic relief of the fourth century was dedicated by an actors' guild to Dionysus. A draped female figure, probably a personification, holds a tragic mask, and three more masks hang on the wall; a boy is engaged in libation, and there are traces of a male figure, perhaps Dionysus himself.

The Sacrifice proper may be rendered in some of those indeterminate scenes where Victory sacrifices a bull. Less obscure is a relief from Coropi, where a male deity, perhaps Dionysus, holds a cup, and by him stand sixteen men (the choregus, that is, and his chorus), whilst a boy leads a pig to the altar.

The Sacrifice proper is often replaced by the Feast scheme, which we have already considered. Here the type has clearly become traditional, and that it is votive is attested by an Athenian example which bears the inscription of a choregus. Another appears to be the dedication of a poet. An old man, crowned with ivy, whose features are distinctive enough to be a portrait, reclines on a couch. At his feet sits a maiden, and before them is a table laden with light food; a lad pours wine for the banqueters. To them enters the youthful Dionysus, holding a thyrsus, and a snake appears on the scene. The female figure is probably allegorical, Poesy or Comedy perhaps, as she probably is in a relief of the fourth century not dissimilar. Here the reclining male figure may be Dionysus himself; the female wears a fawn-skin. Hard by stand three actors, in stage dress and masks; and the inscription has been interpreted as Παιδήα (i.e. Παιδεία). A large class of reliefs, which have been interpreted without good reason as the visit of Dionysus to Icarius, show the god, sometimes with satyrs in company, breaking in upon a scene of feasting. Masks are also sometimes represented in these scenes; and taking all points into consideration, it is possible that they were the votive tablets of poets or actors. Dionysus and Victory are found on a tripod base which once stood in the Street of Tripods.

These examples do not by any means end the tale of scenic dedications, but the most part give no hint of the object dedicated. We may fairly assume, however, that since these dedications, ranging from the earliest times to the Roman empire, from Sicily to the Crimea, from Macedon to Crete, fall into a few well-defined classes, those which have perished belonged to some of them. A few early examples may be here added. There is an archaic pillar from the Argive Heraeum, inscribed with a dedication, and mentioning Nemean and other games. Aristocrates son of Seelius made a dedication at Athens; there are records of a chariot-victory at Eleusis, and at Athens of the victory of Alcibius, a flotist from Nasus in Asia Minor. There is a dedication to the Twelve Gods for Isthmian and Nemean victories; and the offering of Phayllus, thrice Pythian victor; and a pillar on which can be distinguished an allusion to the games. Plato also speaks of dedications made for such victories.

In the fourth and succeeding centuries we meet still with victories in the great games: Hegestratus conquers at Nemea; Diophanes wins the youths' pancratium at the Isthmus, and he mentions with pride a success of his grandfather's; another man, whose name has been lost, wins the pair-horse race at Olympia, another is victor in the three remaining celebrations. The allusions to these games become fewer, however, though we do find the περιοδονίκης quite late; and the interest is diverted to a host of minor celebrations which spring up elsewhere. The Panathenaea is always with us, and the ‘Argive shield’ is not uncommon; but along with them come Ephesia, Claria, and Iliaea, Eleusinia, Amphiparea, Trophonia in Lebadea, Dionysia, Thargelia, and Naa in Dodona, Delia, Soteria, Heraclea in Thebes. During the Roman period we find the Thesea, Epitaphia, Hephaestea, Charitesia in Dehoenus, even Panellenia, Hadrianea, Eusebea, and Capitolea. The events in these are often athletic, but oftener still of other types which will shortly engage our attention.

Outside Attica the records are less complete, but they suffice to show that the victor’s pride was as great, and his gratitude acknowledged in the same way, all over the Greek world. An ancient inscription of Argos describes how Aeschylus won the stadium four times, and the race in armour thrice, at the home games, for which he dedicated to the Dioscuri a slab depicting them in relief. A Theban pancratiaiast erects a memorial to his Pythian victory at home. Another has won the boxing at the Trophonia, Coriasia, and Poseidea. A redoubtable boxer of the second century has twelve victories to his credit, and another athlete of three or four centuries later no less than twenty-four. A man of Tegea wins forty-three victories in racing on foot or on horseback, including the Asclepiea, Lyceae, Hecatombaea, and Basilea. A Delphian records victories at Olympia, Nemea, the Isthmia and the Pythia. Victories are also still recorded in Sparta. An Athenian commemorates at Oropus his victory in casting the javelin on horseback. A victor of Elatea mentions eight victories, the Nemean amongst them. Victors of Megara dedicate some building at home for victories abroad. So too with the island communities. Dorocleidas of Thera wins the boxing and pancratium, and dedicates a thank-offering to Hermes and Heracles. A Rhodian wrestler commemorates his success at half-a-dozen places, including Nemea and Delphi; others a victory with a chariot in Olympia, a pancratium, and so forth. In Asia Minor the same features offer themselves.

The variety of local games will not fail to have struck the reader in examining the inscriptions quoted above. And along with the new Games new kinds of contests come into notice. At Delos, for example, we find recorded the regulations for a yearly feast, probably that called the Coressia. The youths are to be carefully trained; and fined for absence; in the final contest there are prizes for shooting with the bow, (1) a bow and full quiver, (2) a bow; for casting the javelin, (1) three javelins and a περικεφαλαία, (2) three javelins; the καταπεταφέτης receives (1) a περικεφαλαία and κοντός, (2) a κοντός; the leader of a torch-race, a shield; and boys, a portion of meat. These contests of the youths on entering manhood were customary also elsewhere. In Athens the ephebes appear to have been educated by the state for military purposes. We have no record of their organisation, if there was any, in the fifth century, and it is now generally believed to belong to the fourth, from which time the inscriptions go on for some six hundred years. In the fourth and third centuries the military spirit gives way before a growing interest in things intellectual or artistic. In the fourth century they were under the charge of Sophronistae, who at the end of this period were themselves subordinate to a Cosmetes. During the same period we find two Paedotribae who managed the gymnastic part of the youths' training, assisted by other officials for the bow, the javelin, the catapult, or other arms. They celebrated feasts with appropriate competitions, including races and regattas. Athenaeus tells us that the prize for the foot-race was a κύλιξ. At the end of their time it was customary to pass votes of thanks to the officials, whose statues or busts were put up in the Gymnasium; and reliefs have been found, which appear to have been dedicated on such occasions, bearing representations of the boat-races or athletic exercises. Similar institutions are recorded for all parts of the Greek world: Megara, Peloponnese, Boeotia, Euboea, Thessaly, Thrace, and Macedonia, Chios, Cyprus, Corecyra, Cos, Delos, Icaria, Naxos, Paros, Rhodes, Samos, Tenos, Thera, the chief cities of Sicily and Asia Minor, Cyrene, and Massalia. Amongst the competitions of later days, which we may assume to have been practised by this class, are reading, painting, calligraphy, general progress, and others which are hard to interpret, besides various kinds of musical and dramatic competitions. As regards the more general competitions, an inscription of Aphrodisias mentions the trumpeter, herald, encomiast, in addition to others more familiar. Mention is made of the erecting of statues for the victors. In the commemoration of these victories, the old simplicity of dedication is quite gone. The statues become practically honorific, and although the old formula is used, they are placed in the gymnasium or elsewhere; whilst the word has so far lost its old meaning, that a sacred month may be said ἀνακείσθαι τῇ θεῷ⁴. So too the victors no longer dedicate their offering out of pure thankfulness of heart. The inscriptions, with their long list of distinctions and their carven wreaths, become a means of advertisement or self-glorification. Finally, the offering becomes compulsory, and is looked on by the temple officials as a source of revenue².

In reviewing the dedications of this chapter the reader will be struck with certain contrasts as against those of other kinds. There is no dedicating of shrines, divine statues, or Victories. The only thing of the kind I have met with is a couple of model shrines of bronze, offered by Myron tyrant of Sicyon for an Olympian victory in 648³. Victory appears in groups, but not alone, unless it be implied in a late inscription of Tegea which records victories in the games⁴. A dedication which I am at a loss to explain is the μῆλα of latter-day Athens⁵. Another freak is the slab with a shaggy head in relief, dedicated with a set of verses to the Muses at Thespiae⁶. Stratonicus the musician plays with the dedicatory idea when he sets up a trophy in the Asclepieum, after vanquishing his rivals at Sicyon, and labels it "Stratonicus from the bad harpists".

In this chapter we see the old simplicity and devotion being gradually overlaid with ostentation and show, until nothing else remains. The beginnings perhaps are earlier here than elsewhere; and the seed of degradation which lay in the dedication of athlete statues began to sprout, it may be in the sixth century; but the critical point, or rather perhaps the point where the new spirit stood revealed to itself, was in the fourth. The lowest pitch of degradation, and the highest point of self-glorification, is reached in that hideous monument of Porphyrius, victor in the chariot-race at Constantinople. In that monument piety there is none; but every feat of the victor is represented in artistic style as bad as its taste, and we leave him with relief to enjoy the applause of a shouting populace¹.

ARISTIDES, Εἰς τὸ φρέαρ του Ἀσκληπιοῦ, 445.

We have seen reason to believe that the cult of heroic spirits was widespread on Greek soil, and prevailed from the earliest to the latest times. They were propitiated or worshiped as beings of great and mysterious powers, and as such likely to be useful both in their general influence on the daily life and in occasional times of need. In their first aspect we find recurrent feasts held in their honour, and memorial offerings of these feasts dedicated, whilst tithes or firstfruits are sometimes offered to them; nor have there been wanting some indications that they were approached in time of need. All inscriptions which mention the vow or prayer imply help given in some such time1. We have seen that the hero-shrines may be supposed to have had much the same part in the national worship as the scattered chapels of to-day; they would be the natural places for use of the country folk who lived afar from large cities. In the cities themselves ancient shrines of this sort would remain by tradition when new manners had come in, just as

Holywell so long remained in London, or Barnwell still remains in Cambridge, as the well of divination remained and still remains in Patrae, or like the shrines of Amynos and the Hero Physician in ancient Athens. But side by side with this ancient popular worship grew up the cult of the great gods; and it usually happened that the gods were invoked for the same purposes as the heroes were, and under similar titles. Zeus is connected with the underworld as Catachthonios, and he is also Melilchios and Soter. Apollo is Alexiaces and Iatros; Artemis is Soteira, and so is Demeter; Dionysus is also Iatros; Athena is Hygieia, Health. The worshipper in offering his prayer adds naturally such titles as these, to indicate the manifestation of the divine power which he desires. Indeed, he goes into detail so far, that when about to sacrifice he may invoke the hero as Flycatcher, or Zeus as Averter of Flies. No less naturally does he address his prayer for protection to the patron deity of his city, who may be supposed to be most powerful there; and if at the same time he addresses the local hero, that is but prudence.

15 Very few of the old Acropolis dedications can be referred to sickness. I have noted two ancient ones from the Acropolis: CIA i. 362, iv. 1. p. 79 Εὐφρόνος κεραμείς ικετεύς Τυγείας. Κατ. 96 'Αθηναίων τῷ 'Αθηναίων τῷ 'Τυγείας. Several have ἶπτερ (49, 189, 238, 246), but this formula may be used of an ordinary tithe or firstfruit (238). We may infer that the people visited Iatros or Amythus in that case. Perhaps Pericles' own dedication was made on purpose to assist in transferring the popular allegiance.
It is chiefly sickness, danger, or sudden calamity which directs the soul to the unseen powers; and these are the special occasions when the ancient Greek paid his vows or exprest his gratitude. One constant and pressing source of danger was war, but the dedications connected with war have been already dealt with; in this chapter we shall take the rest, and chiefly the vows and dedications made in time of sickness. This it so happens is the easier, because in early times certain divinities had come to be regarded as specially powerful against the ills which the flesh is heir to. We have already seen that the protective power of the heroes was quite general; but as the great gods relieved them of responsibility in their more public and striking aspects, the private function of alleviating the pains of sickness became their peculiar care, and in particular devolved upon two or three personages who by accident or otherwise achieved notable fame.

In accordance with the principle suggested in the last paragraph, public offerings for deliverance from plague and pestilence are generally dedicated to one of the great gods. Epimenides, summoned to Athens in time of pestilence, is said to have cleansed the city, and built a shrine of the Eumenides. Three temples are referred to afterclaps of the great plague at Athens (430—427). One is the romantic fane of Apollo the Helper, erected among the mountains at Bassæ by the village of Phigalea, and looking down over the Messenian plain to far distant Ithome. Next comes the temple of Apollo Healer at Elis; and last that of Pan Deliverer in Troezen, who had revealed to the city magistrates in a dream how they might heal the plague. A public dedication of some statue to Athena Hygieia exists, but this is too trifling to refer to the great plague. There seems to have been a temple and statue of Heracles Averter of the plague was raging\(^1\). Early in the fifth century Hermes was said to have averted a plague at Tanagra by carrying a ram about the walls; and in gratitude the people caused Calamis to make them a statue of Hermes the Ram-bearer\(^2\). In similar danger the people of Cleone, in obedience to an oracle, sacrificed a he-goat to the sun; and when the plague was stayed, they dedicated a bronze he-goat to Apollo at Delphi\(^3\). Statues of Apollo Averter of Mischief, by Calamis\(^4\), and of Heracles under the same title, by Ageladas\(^5\), which existed at Athens, may be referred to a similar origin. Indications are not wanting that the practice continued later; one such is a hymn composed and sung to Asclepius on deliverance from a noisome pestilence\(^6\).

The same practice holds for other dire visitations. Deliverance from a plague of locusts was recognised by a statue of Locust Apollo, attributed to Pheidias\(^7\). Perhaps the cult of Mouse Apollo in the Troad was originally due to a plague of mice, although it may be propitiatory or even totemistic\(^8\). There was a statue of Earth praying for rain on the Athenian Acropolis, dedicated therefore probably to Athena, which commemorated a drought\(^9\). We do not know the date of this, but Pausanias would have heard more about it if it had been near his own day; and if not, the dedication may be illustrated by an inscription on the rock, of the first or second century after Christ, which mentions Earth the Fruitful\(^10\). We read of another great drought that fell over all Greece, so that envoys were sent to Delphi to enquire what help there might be. They were instructed to propitiate Zeus by means of Aeacus as intermediary, and messengers were sent to Aeacus asking his aid. By prayers and sacrifices to Zeus Panhellenian the drought was stayed; and the Aeginetans set up images of their envoys in a precinct called the Aeaceum.

Such offerings were most naturally promised beforehand and paid on deliverance, but they were occasionally made in faith while the devastation went on. Thus during a flood of the Eurotas, an oracle commanded the Spartans to build a temple to Hera Protectress, which they did. To avert from their vines the baleful influence of the constellation called the Goat, the Phliasians dedicated a bronze goat in the market place. To end a barrenness in the earth, the Epidaurians set up statues of Damia and Auxesia, personifications of Subduing and Increase.

There are not wanting private dedications to the gods for healing and deliverance. Alyattes the Lydian, early in the sixth century, offered at Delphi for the cure of a disease a great silver bowl, with a stand of welded iron, which struck the imagination of Herodotus. A relief dedicated to Athena seems to acknowledge help of this sort, and perhaps another to Paean Apollo is of the same class. Pericles we know dedicated a statue to Athena Hygieia, for saving the life of a workman who fell from a scaffolding there. Demeter was a healer at

I suggest that Pericles made the dedication on purpose to support the worship of Athena, then not fashionable with the conservative nobles or with the country folk. The question is too wide to be discussed here; but some suggestive evidence is to be found in Aristophanes, where the oath by Poseidon is the favourite with these classes (see e.g. Knights 144, 551, 543, and Neil's notes).
Eleusis\(^1\); and when Asclepius came to Athens he must needs be initiated into the mysteries and so be affiliated to her\(^2\). She appears to have had the same function elsewhere\(^3\). Artemis Lyé was invoked for sickness in Sicily\(^4\); Artemis Oulia and Apollo Oulios at Lindos in Rhodes\(^5\), and at Miletus\(^6\). Appeals in sickness are made to Lathrië\(^7\) and to Cytherea\(^8\). Micythus of Rhegium, who in his son’s sickness had spent much on many physicians without avail, dedicated at Olympia a number of statues and other offerings “to all gods and goddesses\(^9\).” The Mothers in Sicily\(^10\), Hecate\(^11\), Cybele\(^12\), and Men\(^13\) are appealed to in sickness, and a river is called Saviour\(^14\). The oracle at Dodona, and doubtless not only that oracle, was consulted in the same case\(^15\). Perhaps Good Luck and the Good Daemon may be added to the list.

But although the greater gods were a present help in time of danger, if they could be prevailed on to act, a being of humbler origin won the highest fame in this sphere, and finally himself attained to divine honours. This was Asclepius.

All indications point to Thessaly as the original home of Asclepius\(^16\). He was the founder and deified ancestor of the Phlegyae and Minyae, the ruling class in Tricca and one or two neighbouring towns. In Homer he is neither god nor hero, and his two sons, Podaleirius and Machaon, are mentioned in the Catalogue of the Ships\(^1\). If there were legends connecting him with Messenia and Arcadia, these rest on later authority, and were doubtless local attempts to claim him when he had become famous. The Arcadian legend makes Apollo his father, which alone is enough to condemn it\(^2\): this is just one of those attempts which we not seldom find, to make the pantheon symmetrical, by reconciling conflicting claims. Strabo follows the general opinion of antiquity in calling the shrine of Tricca "the oldest and most famous" of those which Asclepius had\(^3\). Cheiron was his teacher, and Cheiron stands as the embodiment of all natural lore, woodcraft, and herb simples\(^4\). On the mount Pelion, where he got all his master could teach him, Asclepius first associated himself (we are told) with the serpent, which afterwards became his attendant and attribute. He is still a man, if a mighty and wise man, and his death by the bolt of Zeus is not consistent with any higher character. After death he becomes a hero, famed for his healing powers, and a chthonian oracle.

With the wanderings of his clan, in their career of migration or conquest, Asclepius gradually moves southwards, and we find him next in Boeotia and Phocis. Here he comes into conflict with Apollo: the god proves victor, but their feud is reconciled by the legend which makes Asclepius son of Apollo by Coronis, who should be faithless to her husband. We next see traces of Asclepius in the Peloponnese, in Titane and Arcadia. Messenia claims him for her own, and warps the legend to suit her claim. Finally he appears in several parts of Argolis, and particularly in the great shrine which afterwards became most famous. That the Epidaurian shrine is one of the latest is shown by the fact that the legends have changed under the influence of Delphi, and have forgotten their origin at Tricca\(^5\). From Epidaurus, now become his headquarters, came a number of offshoots\(^6\). Chief of these were: (1) Sicyon, at a date unknown;

(2) Athens, founded in 420; (3) Balagrae in the Cyrenaica; (4) Epidaurus Limera; (5) Cos, though Herodas will have it the cult came straight from Tricca; (6) Naupactus, about 300; (7) Tarentum; (8) perhaps Syracuse; (9) Pergamus; (10) Rome. Besides these he is found at Clazomenae, Delos, Teos, and Phocaea, and cults connected with him at many other places.

By this time Asclepius has become a full-fledged god, and his family has increased and multiplied. His sons Machaon and Podaleirius belong, as we have seen, to the earliest period of the legend; but he has now more, whose names indicate personifications of his powers, Ianiscus and Alexenor, and Euamerion also called Telesphorus or Acesis. A blooming bevy of daughters has also sprung up around him, Iaso, Aceso, Aegle, and Panaceia, together with the more general personification Hygieia or Health. The last is assumed by some to be not a daughter, but an independent personification, which was naturally associated with him and then became younger to suit her new character: the cult of Athena Hygieia makes for this view. His wife’s name is differently given as Xanthe, Lampetia, Aglaïe, or Hipponoë.

Amphiaraus in some points resembles Asclepius. He appears in legend as a doughty hero, who took part in adventures such as the hunt of the Calydonian Boar, the voyage of the Argo, and through the covetousness of his wife Eriphyle, who accepted the famous necklace as a bribe, in the war of the Seven Against Thebes. Fleeing before his foes in his chariot, drawn by the two renowned horses Thoas and Dido, he was about to be overtaken, when Zeus cleft the earth with a thunderbolt and he plunged in. Hence arose the great shrine of Amphiaraus at Oropus near Thebes, the seat of an oracle and a health resort, where the heroized seer gave responses and healed the sick.
Amphiaraus was not, like Asclepius, a colonising deity. As communication became easier, patients made it a commoner practice to visit shrines of repute, which thus became health-resorts and places of pleasure not unlike the Baths or the Wells of eighteenth-century England. Moreover, Amphiaraus had not the advantage of belonging to a wandering clan; and when the time of his fame arrived, it was too late for colonising: he had been outstript by his rival. Like Asclepius, Amphiaraus in time becomes a god, first recognised by the Oropians but afterwards by all the Greeks.

It is with these two deities we shall have chiefly to do in the following pages; but it will be convenient to collect at the same time such instances of thank-offerings to other gods as come within the scope of this chapter. In the Roman age we find a large number of new rivals for fame as healers and deliverers, especially Men and Anaitis in Asia Minor, Sarapis in Egypt and in Greece. But by this time the old ideas had lost their significance, and such examples will only be adduced for illustration. For the same purpose I shall refer to Cybele, Hecate and others, whose functions were not restricted to healing. Hecate, indeed, with or without a consort, had sometimes a special power in this department. A throne cut out of the rock is dedicated to her in Rhodes as Saviour, and in the island of Chalce a similar throne is ascribed to her.

Three shrines are chiefly important for our survey: those of Asclepius at Epidaurus and at Athens, and that of Amphiaraus in Boeotia. Each of these fills up a gap in the record, and from the three we are able to piece together a fairly complete account of the cult. We may assume that the practice at Athens and at Epidaurus did not materially differ; and the points peculiar to the third will be noted in their place.

The story how the Asclepieum at Athens was founded is

1 He only colonised Byzantium; but he had another shrine at Rhamnus.
2 The Theban oracle was very old, but the sanctuary of Oropus seems to date only from the fifth century. (Frazer on Paus. i. 8. 3.) For dream-oracles Amphiaraus was worshiped all through Greek history.

interesting and instructive in more ways than one, and fortunately we have a full account of it. In founding a new shrine the custom of the Epidaurian priests was to send out one of the sacred snakes from their sanctuary. Pausanias describes how Asclepius came to Sicyon under the form of a snake, in a car drawn by a pair of mules. The same thing is told of the founding of Epidaurus Limera, and of the temple on the Tiber Island at Rome. So when Telemachus of Acharnae proposed to found the Athenian shrine, in the year 420, the same procession of snake and car may be assumed. Asclepius then, or the priest perhaps or even the serpent, in place of him, was actually initiated into the Mysteries at Eleusis, and a statue was set up on that occasion. The priesthood of the Goddesses appears to have welcomed him at first, it may be in the hope of retaining him in their shrine; but when it appeared that Telemachus was for building a new shrine at Athens, they turned round and fought him tooth and nail. Part of the precinct would lie in the Pelasgicum, which as we know was better empty; and whether or not for this reason, the college of State Heralds were egged on to claim the land. In time however the god prevailed, and after a few years he had settled down comfortably at Athens.

The shrine of Asclepius at Athens, thus erected at the close of the fifth century, stood in a grove of trees like the ordinary hero-shrines. There were porticoes or covered buildings for the patients to sleep in when they consulted the god. In the precinct was a spring, and perhaps a basin of water for ceremonial use. In the same precinct were afterwards erected a number of altars and statues of various divinities, Demeter and the Maid, Athena, Aphrodite, Hermes, Pan and the Nymphs, the hero Heracles, and later Isis and Sarapis. Many of the votive offerings stood here, but the more precious were kept within the temple, stored away, placed on shelves, or on the walls and ceiling. Withinside was a statue of Asclepius himself, a sacred couch and table, tripods, altars, and tables of offerings. The effect of the scene is well described in Herodas, who represents two women in the temple of Cos, in a passage which is worth reproducing.

Phile. Hail, healer Lord, who rulest Tricca and hast made thy abode in lovely Cos and Epidaurus; and withal Coronis thy mother and Apollo hail, and Health, whom thy right hand touches, and those of whom are these honoured altars, Panace and Epio and Ieso, hail; and ye who sackt the city of Laomedon with its fortress walls, healers of fierce disease, Podaleirius and Machaon, hail, and all gods and goddesses who are housed by thy heart, father Paean. Put the tablet on the right hand of Health, Coccal. Ha, my dear Cynno, what fine statues! why, what artist wrought this stone, and who offered it?

Cynno. The sons of Praxiteles: don't you see the writing upon the base there? And Euthies son of Prexon is the dedicator. Paeon bless them and Euthies for the fine things. See yon girl, Phile, looking at this apple? Wouldst not say she will die outright if she do not get it?

Phile. And the old man there, Cynno. By the fates, how the boy throttles the fox-goose. If 'twere not for the stone beside you, you would say the thing will speak. Ha, the time will come when mortals will make the very stones live. Dost see how that statue of Batale stands, Cynno? If one has never seen Batale, look at this portrait and never miss the other.... And if I scratch this naked boy, won't there be a wound! There's the flesh throbbing warm as it were, all warm on the tablet. And the silver tongs! why, if Myellus or Pataeciscus see it, won't their eyes fall out of their heads thinking it is really made of silver? And the ox,

The Epidaurian shrine was laid out on a still more magnificent scale, with every convenience for patients and visitors. The temple contained a gold-ivory statue of the god seated, which is copied in many of the votive statuettes or reliefs there found. Besides the ordinary dormitories and porticoes, there was the curious Rotunda, perhaps a pump-room, with a grove, a stadium, and a theatre which was the pride of the place.

Its fame lasted undiminished to Roman times, and under the empire Antoninus (probably Pius) built a place outside the precinct for women lying-in and for the dying.

Our information as to the priesthood of the Athenian shrine is fairly full. Chief of all is the priest, elected yearly until the Roman period, when the Zacoros grows into greater importance. A board of officials presides over the sacrifices. Of temple servants we read of the sacristan and fire-bearer, and two women, the basket-bearer and the Arrephoros. Some persons went by the title of physician, and both the priest and the Zacoros at least occasionally held this office. A board was nominated yearly by the people to inspect and catalogue the ex-voto. In Epidaurus there were priest, pyrophoros, dadouchos, and zacoros; a hierophant is also mentioned. In Cos we find a Neocoros presiding at the occasional sacrifice of the devout, killing the victim, and offering prayer. There were two great feasts in Athens, Epidauria and Asclepiasion, and apparently also a more modest feast, the Heroa. The Epidauria celebrated the initiation of the god at Eleusis; and a relief offered perhaps on this occasion has been found, where Asclepius, leaning upon a staff, stands in the presence of Demeter and the Maid, and a troop of six worshippers approaches them. This is conjectured to be a formal public offering on behalf of five magistrates or others who represent the city, having received a vote of thanks and a crown each for their services. The Asclepiea seems to have been less important, as no inscriptions have been found which relate to it. The Heroa was doubtless held to keep up tradition, and we may suppose that this is the occasion when the Death-feast reliefs were dedicated. At the public feasts an ox or a bull was sacrificed; there was a lectisternium and a watch-night with illuminations, as in the worship of other gods. It is to be noted that the sacrifice had to be consumed within the precinct at Epidaurus and Titane, at Athens, and at the oracle of Amphiaraus, which was the custom with heroes in some cases at least.

The private worshipper, who wished to offer his prayer or find a cure for his complaint, probably had to prepare himself by a ceremonial purification. We know that death or birth was supposed to pollute a Greek shrine, and in particular neither should take place in the shrine of Epidaurus. So there are indications that the worshipper was expected not to come in contact with such things, and must keep continence for a certain time before he approached the god. But let that pass: and now suppose the worshipper duly prepared.

He must probably first pay an entrance fee of a few obols, and then perform the preliminary sacrifice. At Epidaurus, when the worshipper desired to be cured of a disease, it appears that the πυρφόρος asked for a solemn engagement that he would make the customary sacrifice and offering if a cure was effected, which was undertaken by the patient or by some one else for him. The patient then underwent a ceremonial cleansing with water; after which prayers were offered at the altar, and cakes were offered upon it, sometimes perhaps being burnt. This done, he waited for the night.

The central ceremony of the whole was that of sleeping in the precinct, technically called incubation. That this took place originally in the temple there can be no doubt, and at Tithorea such continued to be the custom. But at the larger health resorts, halls or colonnades were provided for the purpose. There were two at Oropus, and probably at Epidaurus; but the description of Aristophanes implies that men and women occupied the same hall at Athens, doubtless each sex to a side. Even their friends could accompany them, if the poet has kept to fact, which there is no reason to doubt. During the night, the god was expected to appear in a vision, and either to treat the patients or to tell them what to do. Hear Aristophanes describe the scene:

"All round," says Carion in the comedy, "were people sick of all manner of diseases. In comes the verger, puts out the lights, and bids us sleep; and, quotha, if you hear a noise, keep a quiet tongue. So we all composed ourselves decently for sleep. But sleep I could not, for my eye caught a pot of pease which stood just behind the old gammer's head, and I had a monstrous craving to crawl after it. Then I looked up, and what should I see but the priest grabbing the cakes and figs from the sacred table. Then he made the round of all the altars, to see if there was a biscuit or two left, and these he consecrated into a bag he had with him. I looked on the performance with much awe, and up I got to fetch the pease." "You bold bad man," says the other, "weren't you afraid of the god?" "Afraid! yes, afraid that he might get there first with his garlands; the priest showed me the way, you see. Well, when gammer heard the noise I made, she got hold and tried to pull it away; but I gave a hiss and bit her, as though I had been one of those hooded snakes."

Cario then tells how the priest, with Iaso and Panacea, went round inspecting all the diseases; and although the story now becomes pure farce, it is clear that he diagnosed them after a fashion, examining the wounds, and treating them with his drugs. When he came to Plutus, after treating his blind eyes, he whistled, and a couple of great snakes came out which proceeded to lick them; and the blind was made whole.

This picture is certainly true to life, for it can be paralleled in almost every particular from the votive reliefs and from the Cures of Epidaurus. These remarkable inscriptions, which Pausanias saw in the dorter, contain a long list of miraculous cures, which remind one of nothing so much as a modern patent medicine. There were similar tablets at Cos and Tricca, which have not yet been found, and fragments of others have been

I quote from Collitz. The inscr. date from the 4th cent., but they contain older cures (Aelian, Nat. An. ix. 33, mentions the woman of Troezen with a worm inside her). unearthed at Lebena in Crete. In the Epidaurian Cures we see that the patient lay to sleep just as the poet describes. Faith he must have had, or he would never have got so far; and in his exalted state he was prepared to believe that the figures which appeared before him were really divine. We can hardly doubt that the priest and his attendants were got up to represent the god and his sons and daughters, which would help the illusion. So in the votive tablets, which we shall examine by and by, the divine personages feel the diseased part, and apply remedies to it. In the Cures the god, or a "handsome man," as he is realistically described sometimes, pours medicine into diseased eyes, and anoints them with ointment. Or he uses massage, chafing the stomach or the head, and giving medicine and instructions how to use it. He even attempts surgery, extracting a lance-head or cutting an ulcer. Now and then he enquires the symptoms; he even condescends to ask what the patient will give if he be cured, and can enjoy a humorous answer. Nothing is too humble for him: he will even compound me a hair-restorer for one whose bald head has been the mock of his friends. The tame snakes and dogs are frequently mentioned; they come out and lick the sores or the eyes of the sufferers. Dogs appear also at the Asclepian shrine in Peiraeus.

Some of the cures are clearly made up, or doctored for effect. Sheer impossible miracles are to be found among them, such as the mending of a broken earthenware pot. The sceptic who will not believe is trod out and convinced, and solemn warnings are addrest to the scornful. Aeschines was a naughty lad, who climbed up in a tree and peept into the place where the suppliants were sleeping. He immediately fell down, and his eyes were put out by the fall. Now he was compelled to eat humble pie, and to become a suppliant himself, when the god magnanimously cured him. Terrible also is the fate of those who forget to pay their dues after they have been cured. A blind man who received sight and then declined to pay, became blind again until he had done so. Another man, who had been cured of disfiguring marks on the face, sent his fee by a friend’s hand, but the friend disowned the payment. It so happened that the friend came to be cured of a similar affliction; and as he lay in the holy place, the god took down from the wall the other man’s bandage (which had been left in grateful remembrance of the cure) and laid it upon the deceiver’s face; who departed thence punisht like Gehazi, with the original scars besides his own. In view of such things as these, it may be objected that there is not a tittle of evidence for the truth of one of them. To this I reply, that there is no reason why some of them should not be true. In cases of nervous disease, such as paralysis, the high-strung imagination may have worked a cure, as it does to this day at Tenos or Lourdes. Nor is there any reason why the priests or doctors, call them what you will, should not have had some rough and ready knowledge of drugs and surgery, like the bone-setters or herbalists of rustic England, which they found it convenient to use with a certain amount of mummery. In fact they took up the same position with regard to the unlearned, as in our own day priestly advocates of the esoteric interpretation of ritual take up towards the laity. One of the Epidaurian cures, that of a Roman, M. Julius Apellas, describes minutely both the symptoms of the disease and the treatment, which was chiefly dietary; and a fragment of a similar document was found at Lebena; Hippocrates himself, if we are to believe tradition, learnt the elements of his craft from the Cures of Cos. But whatever be the fact about the cures, yet the setting of them must have been true. If there were no incubation, no vision of a god or a handsome man, no dogs and snakes, the testimonials would have simply excited the laughter of those who came to seek health from the god.

Incubation was also practised at the oracle of Amphiaraus, but the ceremony which preceded it differed from that we have described above. Those who would consult the oracle first purified themselves, then sacrificed a ram, and slept on his skin.²

And now, in spite of all reasons to the contrary, the patient is cured: he is to pay the thank-offering due. A private person, unless he be rich, can hardly be expected to offer a bull, or even a pig;² his tribute was commonly a cock. We return to Herodas, who describes this part of the proceedings³.

“Hither come,” cries Phile, invoking the gods named, “and be kind to us for this cock which I sacrifice to thee, the herald of the house, and accept the cakes and fruit.¹ We have not much substance nor to spare, else would I bring thee an ox, or a sow in pig fat enough, and no cock, to pay for the healing of the diseases which thou hast wiped away, with thy gentle hands touching them.—Put the tablet on Health’s right hand,

The victim is handed to the attendant, who goes out and kills it. When the worshippers have gazed, their fill at the sights, they recall him, and he enters through a door, with the words:⁶

Good is your sacrifice, women, and promises well for you; no one ever had greater favour of Paeon than you have.—Iē iē Paeon, be gracious to these women for this sacrifice, and to their lovers if they have any, and their offspring to come. Iē iē Paeon, so be it, amen!

Phile. Amen, so be it, O mighty! and in all health may we come again with husbands and children bringing greater victims.—Coccale, don't forget to cut the leg of the fowl for the attendant, and pop the cake into the serpent's hole in dead silence, and moisten the barley-meal. We'll eat the rest at home. And don't forget to give some for Health.

Thus the thank-offering is made, the prayer is said; the temple receives its dues, and the rest of the victim makes all merry at home. At Epidaurus and at Oropus the whole had to be eaten in the precinct, and none might be taken away; we do not know what was the rule at Athens.

We read of a physician, it will be remembered, in the Athenian inscriptions, and it is worth while enquiring what the relation was of the Asclepian shrines to scientific medicine or surgery. Scientific doctors there were in ancient Greece, as we know, the most notable being the medical school of Cos with its great leader Hippocrates; where also at a later date the professional physician is known. In the works which have come down to us under this name are included a large number of independent treatises by different persons; some of which are of real value, and show that the ancient schools used research and experiment, and had more than empirical knowledge of their art. There are also collections of cases among them, which describe symptoms, treatment, and result. How seriously the physicians took their calling may be seen from the remarkable oath which all had to take before admission to the guild. That there were professional physicians practising at Athens in the sixth century is proved by the tablet of Aeneus already described. In the fifth century we find private practitioners, and also public physicians appointed by the state to a dispensary or hospital. Herodotus speaks of one Democedes, of Croton, most famous physician of his day; and at an early date we find Menocritus of Samos practising in Carpathos. These physicians were distinct from the staff of the Asclepieum, but there does not seem to have been any antagonism between them. In the third century it was an 'ancient custom' for the public physicians to sacrifice twice a year to Asclepius and Hygieia, and to make an offering on their own behalf and their patients. Such may have been the origin of the relief already described, where six worshippers approach Asclepius, Demeter, and the Maid; of the three names inscribed above the tablet, two are known to have been physicians, Epeuches and Mnesitheus. Perhaps the people on this occasion voted money for the cup mentioned in the Asclepine lists, as they did for the ephebes at Eleusis. The fact is, the physicians and the temple appealed to different classes of persons. The fullest information available as to the ancient dedicators comes from the Inventories of the Athenian shrine. There the women are slightly in excess of the men. A number of priests are among them, but their dedications do not concern us here. Nicomachus is called physician as well as priest, and so is Onetor. Half-a-dozen more priests are named: Archicles, Antocles, Ctesonicles, Philocrates, Theodorus, Xenocritus. One dedicator is termed ἀρχιθέωρος. Beyond these there is nothing to tell who the dedicators were, or what was their calling in life. The names are as other Greek names, but those of women are often diminutives. It must be borne in mind that these lists do not include all the offerings in the temple, nor perhaps the chief of them. There are no inventories amongst the Epidaurian inscriptions, but in the Cures there is evidence that it was usual to dedicate a memorial after cure. Childish anecdotes like the Epidaurian Cures would have been rejected by Plato or Sophocles as readily as by any educated man of to-day; such as these, and doubtless the richer citizens, with a few exceptions like Theopompos, went to the physicians. But the ordinary Greek was simple, and tried the faith cure, which was at once cheaper and more in accord with ancient tradition. If we set aside the temple officials, who naturally would support the establishment, most of the dedicators’ names in the lists lack the demotic adjective; which may imply that they were foreigners, or humble tradesmen, not citizens of Athens. Or the temple might be the last resort of those who could get no relief from the physicians, as Micythus of Rhegium, and the sufferer in the Anthology: a small indication, but it points the same way as our theory. In this respect modern analogies are instructive. To pass by the peasants of Europe, who still consult their wise women and seventh sons of a seventh son, the sanctuaries of the Levant show much the same thing as we are assuming for the ancient. There are properly trained doctors in every part of the Greek world; yet the people still throng to the feast of the Virgin at Tenos or Ayassos, and to many another shrine; the monasteries generally contain one or more families who come in hope of healing and deliverance¹.

We may classify as follow the offerings which commemorate a deliverance from sickness.

1. The Image of the Deliverer.
2. The Image of the Person Delivered.
3. Representation of the act or process.
4. Miscellaneous.

(1) Image of the Deliverer. A number of bases, or fragments of bases, found at Athens, seem to have borne statues of Asclepius. Asclepius was probably dedicated by Cichesippus in the fourth century², and Hygieia with him in another case³; she also stands alone⁴. Herodes dedicates to Demeter a statue of the god as initiate⁵. It is possible, of course, that some of these bases bore statues of the persons delivered. At Epidaurus were found many statuettes of the god, some inscribed, but none of early date⁶. One, bears the legend, "Ctesias to the Saviour?"; another has a verse inscription of Plutarchus, high-priest of Bromius in Athens in the fourth century after Christ⁸. Statuettes of Hygieia are also preserved⁹, one dedicated to her as Saviour and Telesphoros¹⁰, one as medical fee¹¹. A statuette of Athena, of Roman date, is inscribed to Athena Hygieia by a priest of Asclepius¹². It would seem, then, that the image of the god was not dedicated by private persons in early times for the healing of disease. Perhaps the seated image of Hecate from Attica belongs to this place; but who knows¹³?

The same idea, but distorted, suggested the dedication of the physician. In the latter part of the fourth century a sick girl seems to have vowed this offering in case of cure, and her father paid it. This is practically a honorific statue, and it falls after the great dividing line. The statue of Polycritus, which was represented with a libation vessel in its hand, if he were the famous physician of Mende, was probably honorific; but it may belong to the next class.

Several of the offerings are snakes. Four little snakes are offered together; a woman of Megalopolis gives a silver snake, weighing nearly 25 drachmae; another is given by Philista. It is conceivable that these had some reference to the temple snakes, as which we have seen used sometimes to lick the patients; and the snake is found carved alone on reliefs of late date. The snakes in that case would by a convention represent the instrument by which the god acts. But there is no evidence whatever for this, and I do not believe it. They may be all ornaments, bracelets or what not; but it is only fair to mention them here, because at the end of the fourth century many things are possible which would have been impossible in the fifth. It should also be added that terra-cotta serpents were found in the shrine of the Mistress at Lycosura.

(2) The Image of the Person Delivered. There are no examples of this class before late in the fourth century, when honorific statues were common. Herodas speaks of a portrait statue of a worshipper at Cos, but we do not know the date of Herodas. At Epidaurus, Clearista dedicated a statue of her son to Asclepius¹, and the date of this is taken to be about 300. A father similarly dedicates his son in the Athenian shrine to Asclepius and Hygieia². No doubt other bases, inscribed on a son or a daughter’s behalf, bore portrait statues. The only parallel I have noticed in the lists is the child of Philostratus³, a gold or silver statuette of eight drachmæ weight. A number of statuettes of children, found in the Athenian precinct, were doubtless votive⁴. One patient in the Epidaurian Cures promises to set up a portrait⁵; and a man and wife dedicate their two sons in fulfilment of such a vow⁶. We must not forget, however, that these images or reliefs, as the descriptions show, are commonly in the attitude of prayer, and thus fall into line with the earlier representations of the act or process which the god has blest (section 3 below). It is only late we could expect to find a realistic figure of a patient in the last stage of consumption, like that from Soissons⁷.

During the same period another custom grew up, that of dedicating models of the diseased part⁸. This custom shows how low the artistic taste of the Greeks had already fallen, but it is not without its moral interest. We are not to suppose any idea of mystical substitution; as before, it is the simple wish to perpetuate the memory of the divine help, but the fact that the old idea takes a new shape proves that it is alive. Whilst in other directions piety had generally become an empty form, here it lived still, and it has continued living from that time to this.

⁶ Collitz iii. 3301 Στράτων Θεωρις Άργειον τοβ μεν διὰ Απόλλωνι Λακατιων ειχάν. Later, and in modern times, the idea has seemed natural. Compare the passage from Aristides xviii. quoted below, p. 211; and see De Brosses’ Letters, tr. Lord Ronald Gower, p. 283 (Casa Santa at Loreto): “Opposite, an angel in silver presents to the Madonna a little Louis XIV in gold, of the same weight as the prince weighed when he first appeared in this world: it was a vow of Anne of Austria.” With the same idea, the lover in a late Greek romance dedicates to Aphrodite a golden image of his beloved lady: Chaereas and Callirrhoë, iii. 6: εἶδε παρὰ τὴν θεὸν εἰκόνα Καλλιρρόης χρυσῆν, ἀνάθημα Διονυσίου. It was recognised by her husband. The same feeling in modern Greece is echoed by the poet Solomos, who, speaking of a shepherd girl who has lost a lamb, makes her say: ὥς παραγά μου, κάμε τὸ θάλαμα, καὶ νὰ σὲ κάμω ἕνα ἄρνι, οὐ ἀστείως νὰ τὸ κρεμάσω εἰς τὴν εἰκόνα σου τῇ σεπτῇ (Works, p. 285).

These objects made of gold or silver are extremely common in the lists. In modern times they are made of the thinnest possible silver foil, very rarely of gold or gilded; but as one or two in the lists are said to be hollow, the implication is that they were then usually solid. It must be remembered that the patients practically paid their doctors’ bills in this way; and a fashionable physician’s fee would make a very respectable silver leg. The favourite disease in Athens during the fourth century seems to have been bad eyes: votive eyes, in ones and twos, make up two-fifths of the whole number. Next to the eye comes the trunk: this may betoken internal pains, or it may include various segments of the body which would tell different tales if we could see them. Two patients out of every fifteen suffered from bad legs, and one out of fifteen from ear-ache or diseases of the hand. Breast, face, mouth, and penis are each several times represented; and now and then half a face or the lower part is specified. Head, feet, fingers, knee and jawbone also appear; one man had toothache, while one man and one woman gave their hearts to Asclepius—in fact the woman actually offered two.

If Asclepius was successful as an oculist, Amphiaraus seems to have been a specialist in lung complaints. At least his list contains dozens and dozens of breasts, all presented by men; one man gives sixty or seventy of them to the shrine. There are also the face, the hand, the nipple, and the pudenda; but the number of such things is small. The worshippers evidently consulted the oracle about other things than bodily health, so that we cannot assume that the votive bowls and baskets, scrapers, lamps, and masks, or the figures of Victory, had necessarily to do with sickness or health. How far these things were common elsewhere we do not know; but there is apparently a golden model of the pudenda muliebria in Delos, where also were a bronze leg and ear (perhaps fragments of vessels), and a number of golden or silvern breasts (possibly a kind of vase).

Parts of the body were also made in relief or repoussé work. Amongst these we have the trunk, the eye, the ear, the leg, and doubtless a fine variety of other members and sections of them. But while the round form is best suited to metal work, the relief is suited best for stone; and the parts of the human body represented in this way are very numerous. These hardly appear in the fourth century, but in the third they spring suddenly into favour and never lose it again. The reason may well be, as Brückner has plausibly suggested, the law which Demetrias of Phalerum made during his rule over Athens (317—307), forbidding the custom of erecting sepulchral reliefs. This killed the whole industry, and in a generation there were few workmen skilful enough to do more than rudely to carve a limb. There appear to be only three which can be assigned to the fourth century. One is a woman's breasts, dedicated by Philæ to Asclepius; another is also a breast, found in the neighbouring shrine of the hero Amynus; the third is a forehead and a pair of eyes dedicated by Praxias. Amongst others are Menestras' leg, a foot and leg, part of the trunk, the upper part of a couple of thighs, breast, penis, finger. Most of those just mentioned are quite late. A new type which comes into favour in the Roman age, is represented by a pair of large feet in the round, placed upon a small base. In Roman times this practice must have been very common, and feet in clay of all sizes may be seen in nearly every museum. Of those which may be assigned to Greek cities I would name one which came from Athens; and two colossal feet with sandals, finisht off at the top and not fragments, coquetishly poised on a base, which were found in South Russia: these are of stone. Melition of Thera, who seems to have suffered from elephantiasis, hit on a quaint way of indicating her gratitude to the god; around the word which described her disease she had drawn a line representing the gigantic size of her foot before the divine power came upon it. A ghastly pair of ears, done in relief and painted, from Epidaurus, belongs to the Roman age. From Melos comes half a left leg.

There were even models of disease, like the golden boils and blains in the ark of Jehovah. Thus Timothea dedicates an ulcer; and possibly the Epidaurian patient who was cured of the same thing may have commemorated it in the same way. Perhaps the inner part of another's ear was realistically portrayed in diseased form.

A large number of these articles come from the shrines of other healing deities. There was in Athens, near the Areopagus, a shrine and a cult of a hero Amynus, the Helper, excavated a few years since. It was ancient, as is proved by archaic terra-cottas which were found in the precinct; as old as the sixth century, and probably older. At the coming of Asclepius there was a danger of the old hero losing the popular favour; but perhaps through the influence of the poet Sophocles he continued to be worshipt, and a society of Orgeones kept his name alive. Here was found one of the oldest limb-reliefs, belonging to the fourth century: it shows the lower part of 9 In the Life Sophocles is said to have been a priest τοῦ Αλκωνοῦ, which Meineke emended to Αλκωνοῦ. Körte ingeniously suggests that the reading should be Αμωνοῦ, and uses this to explain the heroizing of Sophocles under the name of Dexion, "because he welcomed Asclepius" (Etym. Mag. Αδεξών). Sophocles may have been the priest of the old deity, and have welcomed Ascl. into the shrine, as was done at Eleusis, so that the shrine became sacred to both jointly. There are dedications to both personages together, AM xxi. 294, 296.

There were found also a female breast, of the third century\(^2\), several fingers, a pair of ears, and a penis, with ground painted red, and a hole in the tablet for hanging. Another series of these objects, found in a cave, on the terrace called the Pnyx, are dedicated to Zeus the Highest\(^3\). Amongst these are several breasts, the pudenda muliebria, a female body from the waist downwards, a pair of arms, part of a thigh, the eyes, and the forepart of the right foot. From Golgos in Cyprus\(^4\) come a face, ears, eyes, thumb, breasts (perhaps with disease markt), a penis, and an inscribed slab with two painted eyes in relief\(^5\). Other fragments had nothing visible upon them, and were doubtless painted. From Cyprus also comes an ear with the disease inscribed in words\(^6\). There is a model of pudenda muliebria in Samos\(^7\); a relief of the hands and part of the arms is in Sparta\(^8\), with a small stone foot\(^9\). A foot dedicated to Zeus comes from Asia\(^10\). An eye is dedicated to Athena in Lesbos\(^11\); a foot in Samos to Hera\(^12\). A tiny leg from the Idaean cave in Crete\(^13\) is perhaps an ornament, as nothing else of the kind was found there. Another shrine which had similar reliefs was one sacred to Artemis Anaïtis and Men Tiamou in Asia Minor. The objects are of late date, and inscribed in horrible Greek. One represents the arm from the elbow; another has a whole batch together, two female breasts, a right leg perched on a cushion, and two eyes, dedicated by a whole family in common.

(3) Representation of the act or process blest by the god.

The relief carvings which are among the most interesting remains connected with the worship of Asclepius, fall into four classes, according as they depict the Visitation of the Sick, the Prayer or Adoration, the Sacrifice, or the Banquet.

(i) Visitation of the Sick. This type is vouched for in the early days of the Athenian shrine. Suda tells us that Theopompus, the comic poet, who flourished about 400, fell very ill, but being cured by Asclepius, he was able to go on composing comedies. On his recovery, he caused a memorial to be carved of Parian marble, inscribed with his name and patronymic. Theopompus was represented lying upon a couch, and beside him the god stood “stretching out his healing hand.” Another figure was a young lad with a smiling countenance, whom

1 Newton thinks they are standard weights: Branchidae, Halicarnassus, and Cnidus, ii. 386, 385. We have already seen Demeter as a healing deity.

2 See Verhandl. der kon. Akad. der Wetenschappen, xvi. 1 ff.; Leemans, Griekshe Opdriften uit Klein-Azië. Perhaps the shrine was in Coloe, where a similar relief was found: BCH i. 128. The Mother of the Gods was also addrest as a healer: CIA iii. 134.

Τ.Κ.Α.Μ ξανδικοῦ. Leemans reads εἰλασάμεν θυατέραν, which is nonsense. I take εἰλασάμενον to be for διασάμενοι, and μητέραν an early form of the acc. which afterwards became regular, as it now is. (Copied from the stone.)

4 They have been collected and examined by P. Girard, Ex-Voto à Esculape, BCH ii. 68 ff.; L'Asclépiéion 29 ff.; F. von Duhn, AZ 1877, 139 ff.; I. Ziehen, Studien zu den Asklepios-reliefs, AM xvii. 229 ff. Compare also AM ii. 214 ff. pl. xiv.—xvii., BCH i. 156 ff. (92 pieces).
Suidas takes to be a personification of the comic poet. "If any one thinks otherwise," quoth he, "let him keep his opinion; but he must not worry me." I would fain not disturb Suidas in his grave, but the figure is more likely to be one of the Asclepiad family, or perhaps the attendant who carries the medicine-case. The existing remains well illustrate this description. They represent scenes in the dortor, where the god’s representative attends to the needs of his patients. The following may be taken as types. (a) Now Asclepius sits by the bed; near the head of the sufferer is one of the god’s sons, holding over him an object which cannot be made out, perhaps a surgical tool. Behind the god’s throne are two worshippers, distinguisht as

1 Suidas s.v. usual in such cases by their smaller size. (b) Or Asclepius stands, leaning upon his staff, about which a snake is entwined.

Over the sick man leans a bearded figure, who holds the man’s head in both hands. (c) Or again, a female figure, Health, or one of the four daughters. Those who attend to the sick man are, in this case, from their size, clearly meant for human beings. By the bedside is another figure, apparently female, but also not divine. Behind Asclepius, who gazes upon the bed, are four worshippers, men and women, and an attendant leads up a pig for sacrifice. At the side of the bed a large basin rests upon the floor.

(d) Another relief shows not only Asclepius seated, with a snake under his chair, but Epione seated, and Aceso, Iaso, and Panaceia standing. There are traces of a group of worshippers. (e) The two sons of Asclepius, Podaleirius and Machaon, are seen with him in a fifth tablet, which comes from Epidaurus. One of them offers Asclepius something which may be a surgical tool. Two worshippers are present with uplifted hands, and there is a dog. On another tablet a woman receives something in a bowl, perhaps a medicine. The gestures and implements differ with each case, and suggest that these tablets were usually made to suit the dedicatory and at his order. It is to be noted that two distinct scenes are represented, both the cure and the service of thanksgiving. The divine persons take no notice of the worshippers, who are of course only present by a convention: the interest centres upon the sick-bed. A relief of this type may be that in which Athena hands some indistinguishable object to a man seated in a chair.

(ii) Prayer or Adoration. The scene is laid usually in a shrine, symbolised by a couple of pilasters supporting an architrave and gable end. On one side sits Asclepius, with or without the deities associated with him; on the other the suppliants approach, upraising the right hand. There is nothing characteristic in the attitude or the dress of the suppliants. In one fragment, the oldest perhaps of all which have survived, Asclepius stands, while a horseman approaches him, followed by his horse. Hygieia stands behind the god, holding a jug. One of this type was found in the shrine of Amyntas. A remarkable tablet from Cythnus shows Asclepius and his four sons, with a worshipper; and the god holds out his right hand to another heroic figure. It is suggested that Asclepius here recognises the power of a local brother in the craft, as we have seen him in partnership with Amyntas.

There are a few reliefs from the sanctuary of Anaïtis, which

I may just mention for their intrinsic interest, although they hardly belong to Greek religion. One represents a god with radiated head, and Artemis-Anaitis in the mural crown, with veil, fillet, and crescent; the inscription mentions that the dedicator was healed by an incantation chanted by the priestess. The standing goddess appears on others, but the formulae greatly differ.

(iii) The Sacrifice. Where the scene is intended to represent a sacrifice the altar is present, sometimes with fire burning upon it. The only animals found on the Athenian reliefs are ram or sow; the cock is not found at all; it is the poor man's gift, and probably those who dedicated it would be not usually able to afford much more. In Cos, however, we have seen the two combined. The worshippers approach with the same gestures as before, and the animal is held by a small figure, which often has likewise a knife or a bowl. Behind follows a figure with a large cylindrical box or basket upon the head, half covered with a cloth; this may have contained cakes or fruit. Sometimes a little casket is carried, containing perhaps a more precious offering. Fruit often appears, grapes or pomegranates and the poppy; snake and tree also appear. The picture of the scene may be completed from a Boeotian vase, which shows a girl bringing in a tray of cakes, in one of which is a lighted taper. The remains of a sacrificial relief, with the leg of an ox and the word "hero" upon it, were found in the Amphiaraum at Oropus. Others were in the shrine of Amynus.

(iv) The Banquet. Beside a table sits or reclines a male figure, naked to the waist. On a table are cakes of various sorts, always some of a pyramidal or conical shape. The worshippers face the deities, and a horse's head appears in the corner. Near the table is a crater, from which an attendant takes wine and offers it to the banqueters. The scheme resembles that of the Death-Feast, which was doubtless the original type of it. Fragments of this scheme, showing amongst other things the horse’s head in a frame, come from the shrine of Amynus.

We have seen above that there are combinations of the types of healing and of worship. There is also one relief, found in Delos, of careless workmanship, which combines the types of Banquet and Sacrifice. The god, holding a patera, reclines by a table heapt up with fruit; one worshipper stands in the corner, and an attendant leads up a ram for offering.

Ruder reliefs, all of late date, sometimes show the serpent alone. There are several serpent slabs now in the Museum at Sparta; others were found in Athens, with the serpent only, or entwined about a tree. A serpent-relief was found in the Athenian sanctuary of the hero Amynus.

In the same shrine, amongst fragments of the familiar types of Reliefs sacrificial, with libation or with victim, and the Death-Feast, came to light a relief which is unique. It represents a bearded man, who holds in both hands a colossal leg, nearly as big as himself, with a thick varicose vein, which may be anatomically correct, but does not look it. He is evidently offering this in the shrine, for a pair of votive feet can be seen inside a recess of the wall.

From the Inventories it is clear that similar reliefs or repoussés, made of gold or silver, were equally common. This kind of course were sure to go into the melting-pot when hard times came, or to be carried off by a Sulla or a Brennus; indeed, they were melted down each year to make room for others: so that we need feel no surprise that none have survived the changes and the chances of two thousand years. Those we read of bore the same general character as those I have described. There were usually figures of one or more worshippers\(^3\); sometimes the god stands with them\(^2\), but no further description of the scene is given. One or two are said to be in a little cell or shrine\(^5\). They were generally inscribed with the names of the offerers; the figure on the relief is always of the same sex as the dedicaton, except where it is given on another's behalf; and in one case at least the worshipping figures are expressly identified with the dedicators\(^4\). The figures were intended then to represent or recall the dedicators. They were therefore made to order, as votive paintings of the same sort are made in Italy to-day. Considerably over a hundred reliefs or chasings are mentioned in the lists; and they are not only offered singly, but sometimes one person gives two, four, six, or as many as fifteen\(^3\). The pious Sibylla probably did not consecrate all her fifteen at one time, but we may take her to be a chronic sufferer, whose faith rose triumphant after every relapse. The same practice held at other shrines whose lists have been spared by time; as that of the Hero Physician, where a number of reliefs are mentioned\(^6\).

for our faith, in the days of Heracles Asclepius was not yet born. But in historical times two patients showed their gratitude by building each a new temple for Asclepius, whom they thus introduced into their own places. One was Archias, who built a temple at Pergamus, when a strained limb had been healed; the other, Phalysius of Naupactus, who received his sight in a miraculous manner, which those who wish may see set forth by Pausanias in the last paragraph of his wonderful book. Altars are dedicated to this god as to others, but late.

Asclepius, like other gods, received a vast number of offerings which it is impossible fully to classify. Some of them, with the temple just named, are given for their own value; others for their ideal; others again partake of both kinds. Amongst these now and then we meet with surgical instruments which if the surgeon dedicated, they belong to another class, but it is possible that the patient may have done so, on the same principle as he might dedicate his doctor's portrait or the image of the saviour god. The conception is crude, no doubt, but that is not enough to exclude it. More natural is the feeling which suggests a dedication of something which the patient has used or worn. Pandarus, whose sores were cured at Epidaurus, who left his bandage behind him hanging upon the wall, and the lame woman who left her crutch by a healing spring, act on the same principle as the soldiers who dedicate a worn-out helmet. The offering of a trinket or garment is different, and less obvious; but it is difficult to see what other reason there could be for keeping three pairs of women's slippers in the shrine of Asclepius, or a cloke, a leather bottell, a soft pillow. When Myrrhine dedicates together a female trunk and a bangle, "on behalf of herself and her boy," it is impossible not to see a relation between the bangle and the boy; and none so simple as that he should have worn it. Whether any such thought were in the worshipper's mind or whether the pious offer them simply as the most precious things they had, we find a great quantity of jewellery and ornaments, of gold and of silver, of brass and even of iron. The ornamental head-dress of wire, bracelets and armlets, serpent-bangles, earrings, mirror, fan, unguent-box; finger-rings of all sorts, and engraved gems or cylinders; sard and jasper, "stones like the sea," crystals—all these appear, some of them again and again. The pushing snob in Theophrastus "dedicates a brass finger-ring to Asclepius, and wears it down to a wire by his eternal oilings and burnishings"; but many poor folks offer their brass or iron trifle with a full heart, and surely with acceptance. No such personal reference can fairly be assumed for the numerous oil-flasks and horns, cups and bowls of all sorts, which occur in the lists. Some indeed, as the Thericlea, are of special make, or perhaps bought out of the income of a dead man's bequest, as has been suggested; but most will have been given for their value. The same may be true of a wooden seat, if this be votive. So with the rarer things: such as a scraper, or a small tripod with chain and cauldron\textsuperscript{1} complete; or small shields\textsuperscript{2}, or little statues of Victory or of Aphrodite\textsuperscript{3}. Almost anything would do for an offering, here as elsewhere. The number of coins is very great, and they comprise triobol, drachma, tetradrachm, and all sorts of intermediate sums up to 153 drachms and 125 tetrachms offered each sum by one person. The commonest coin is the tetrachm, a four-drachma piece\textsuperscript{4}. What strikes one as odd is, that these coins were kept carefully apart like the other offerings; doubtless they were used eventually, but for a time at least there they remained in little heaps. So I have seen in a Greek church coins affixed to the face of an image with wax\textsuperscript{5}.

Quite unique is the humour of one case, where the god of Epidaurus bids an unbeliever to dedicate a silver sow in memory of her folly\textsuperscript{6}. The worshipper's thoughts are generally very far from subtle; and none of them would have understood the humble devotee, who in a chapel above the Pool of Bethesda dedicates his heart to the Virgin "in gratitude for his conversion from Protestantism\textsuperscript{7}.''

As regards deliverance from peril of other kinds, there are a good many instances recorded. Alcathous, when he slew the lion of Cithaeron, built a temple to Apollo and Artemis in Megara\textsuperscript{8}. On hearing of the death of Polycrates, Maeandrius his successor erected an altar to Zeus of Freedom\textsuperscript{9}. The famous chest of Cypselus was dedicated to Zeus at Olympia by his family, as the means of a notable deliverance, he having been hidden in a chest to the saving of his life\textsuperscript{10}. Themistocles built a shrine to Dindymene, who in a dream had warned him of a plot to murder him. His sons also, after their return from exile, placed a memorial picture containing his portrait in the Parthenon. Pericles dedicated to Athena Health a statue in memory of a workman who had fallen from a scaffolding, but was saved. Athena too was the goddess whose help Lycurgus acknowledged for the sight of his eye, and built her a temple under the title Optilitis or Ophthalmitis. So no doubt in other less common deliverances. Parmeniscus, we know, could not laugh until he saw the wooden image of Leto at Delos; and it is odd that one Parmeniscus in the fifth century dedicates at Delos a magnificent crater of silver. Battus consulted the Delphic oracle about his stuffing tongue, and it would be strange if he were not prepared to acknowledge help in that matter; or if the ugly babe, whom Helen's spirit made beautiful, and who after became Ariston's wife, had no thank-offering to make. Gratitude for any favour was cause sufficient; for Amphictyon erected an altar to Dionysus Orthus, because he had taught him so simple a feat as to mix wine with water. What a difference between this simple, if childish thought, and the base flattery which deified the mistress of Demetrius Poliorcetes, and built a temple to Aphrodite Lamia.

Most of the records of this class refer to peril by sea, and they begin with legendary times. Britomartis fishing with nets fell into them, and being saved by Artemis, built a temple of Artemis Dictymna in Crete. Daedalus delivered from the sea erected a statue to Heracles at Thebes. The Argonauts, after their perilous voyage, built a temple to Athena, and dedicated the Argo herself to Poseidon at the Isthmus. Arion on his miraculous escape placed at Taenarum a group representing himself upon the dolphin. Diomede, who escaped shipwreck after the sack of Troy, built a shrine to Apollo Epibaterios in Troezen; Agamemnon dedicated his rudder to Hera in Samos, as the means of his deliverance. In the Odyssey Eurylochus vows a temple to the Sun if he return safe. Herostratus voyaging from Cyprus, and having in his possession a small figure of Aphrodite, off Naucratis a storm arose; he prayed to his divinity, and the sea fell calm, and when he came safe ashore he dedicated the figure in Aphrodite’s temple in that place.

The idea of Divine protection at sea is thus regarded as natural, but the deity is not always the same. It might be a “saving fortune” who alighted upon the ship, and steered it safe; it might be Poseidon, or the Cabiri, or the Dioscuri who came to be confused with them; a local protector, Apollo, Athena or Aphrodite of the Fair Voyage, or the Delian Brizo, Hera¹, Hermes², the Theban Heracles³. But in any case, the rescued mariner must needs make his acknowledgment⁴. Inscriptions which record a safe return belong to the same class⁵.

Asclepius himself was worshipt as a protector from peril in general⁶; and here I see not an extension of the older idea, but a survival of the general protective powers of the Hero as Saviour. In Syros offerings are made to him for protection from shipwreck⁷, and even in Epidaurus he is acknowledged as a god with more powers than medicinal⁸. Among the Athenian reliefs is one in which a man, together with his family, renders thanks to Asclepius and Hygieia for being ransomed out of the hands of the enemy⁹; and the fragment of another, which shows only the remains of two horses' heads, may be part of a scene which depicted the devotee in theme of being dasht over the rocks in a runaway carriage⁰. From the fourth century we have a dedication of a portrait to Pallas for deliverance "from great dangers"¹¹. From Camirus comes another, offered to Hecate and Sarapis on a similar occasion. A wayfarer in Phrygia, who escaped drowning at a perilous ford in a river, set up a memorial to Zeus, Poseidon, Athena, and all the gods. Three persons with Roman names give thanks in Lesbos to God on High for deliverance after a tempest. Eutychus, who may have been a skipper, returns thanks at Delos to Fair-weather Zeus and the Egyptian deities, on behalf of himself and his son and all on board. In Delos also, and to Anubis, Demetrius of Sidon dedicates a part of the ship's deck, which we may suppose to have saved his life when the ship went to pieces. There is a relief with a boat upon it, dedicated to the Dioscuri, which possibly is a seaman's thank-offering. In the second century after Christ, Artemidorus and his family dedicate a relief, representing a sacrificial scene, for deliverance at sea.

Perhaps a silver trireme in the Delian shrine may be a sailor's thank-offering. In the same treasury were silver anchors and a ship's beak, and a beak there was also in the shrine of Hero Iatras at Athens. No doubt the images of Calm and of the Sea, which were dedicated to Poseidon at the Isthmus, had reference to perils upon the deep. A dedication by an admiral Pantaleon to "Poseidon saviour of ships and to Aphrodite mistress of ships" was found at Kertch. Some of the paintings in the temple of Phocaea may have been thank-offerings of seafarers, which depicted perils on the deep.

A sacrificial relief dedicated to Poseidon is probably due to a like cause. Another from Halicarnassus, now published for the first time, represents three scenes carved on a marble drum: (1) two seamen in a boat under full sail; (2) Poseidon on a galley, resting on an oar, and holding a dolphin, and a worshipper kneeling before him; (3) Asclepius, Hygieia, and the serpent, with a worshipper between.

Of other occasions I may mention a few examples. The famous work of Lysippus, Alexander's Hunting in Delphi, was dedicated by Craterus who had saved the king's life from a lion. Deliverance from earthquake is also recorded, and deliverance in general terms. The people of Aegae build a temple to Apollo Chresterus, for having been "saved by the consul Publius Servilius." Prayer and thanksgiving are offered for deliverance from poverty or for general goodwill.

One allegorical dedication may be added. After the expulsion of the Peisistratids (510), the people set up a bronze lioness on the Acropolis, in memory of Leaena Aristogeiton's mistress, who had been tortured and found faithful unto death. The lion we have already seen allegorically used of the courage of brave men; and it never was more appropriate.

Whilst athletic victories gave rise to the glorious odes of

Pindar, gratitude for deliverance has left little mark in literature. The earlier dedications are as simple as they could possibly be, and the vast majority of the objects described in this chapter were ticketed merely with the names of the giver and the god, or the giver alone. Verse dedications, so common in other cases, are rare in this, and I know of none which are very early. We have met with a few upon the offerings in Athens, and one is quoted in the Epidaurian Cures. In the sixth book of the Anthology there are only two dedications to Asclepius, and some half dozen references to disease. On the other hand, the records of other perils are many. Dionysius alone was saved from shipwreck out of forty persons, by virtue of a charm which he tied on his thigh; he now dedicates an image of the saving "tumour." Diogenes perhaps cannot afford to buy an offering, but dedicates his cloak to Cabirus, who being invoked in a storm saved him from the perils of the great deep. The hair might also be offered on such occasions. Shepherds delivered from a ravening lion dedicate to Pan, and hang upon an oak tree, a representation of the adventure. A variation on this theme gives several epigrams, which describe how an emasculating votary of Cybele is saved from a lion, and dedicates to the goddess his trappings with locks of his hair. A father who had shot a snake which was coiling about his son's neck, hangs up his quiver on an oak to Alcon. A mother thanks Aphrodite Urania for taking care of her children. A thirsty traveller led by the croak of a frog to a place of water, dedicates the frog's image in bronze at this spring. Self-conscious literary art plays with this idea, but hardly improves upon it. Thus Callimachus makes his Eudemus offer a salt-cellar to the Samothracian gods, in token of deliverance from "storms of debt".

Thus Callimachus makes his Eu- demus offer a salt-cellar to the Samothracian gods, in token of deliverance from "storms of debt".

There remains yet one class of dedications to be mentioned, those connected with trials by law, vengeance, imprisonment, slavery and the like. When Heracles punishes Hippocoon, he built a temple to Athena Axiopoinos. Orestes, acquitted before the Areopagus of the guilt of murder, dedicated an altar on the spot. We learn that those who were acquitted in that court used to sacrifice to the Eumenides; and the occasion would be a fitting one for a votive offering. Hypermestra, who had disregarded her father's command to kill Lynceus her husband and was brought to trial for the same, on being acquitted set up a statue of Victorious Aphrodite, and built a shrine of Artemis surnamed Persuasion. In the temple of Athena Alea at Tegea were fetters hung, which the Spartans had once brought for the enslavement of the Tegeans; but being defeated, they had themselves to wear them, and they were afterwards preserved in memory of the great deliverance. There was a similar memorial on the Acropolis of Athens; and in Phlius prisoners set free used to hang up their fetters in a sacred grove. The idea of memorial is clear, but with other associations, in a story told of Croesus. When Cyrus proffered him a boon, he requested that his chains might be sent to Apollo.

at Delphi, and that the god might be asked why he had so deceived him.1

Two dedications to Nemesis show the goddess trampling upon a prostrate man, and beside her a serpent and a griffin; in one of them she is winged, and holds a wheel. They come from Gortyn and Peiraeus. The inscription which is found on the latter does not imply any special occasion2. A late relief is dedicated to Nemesis3 as a thank-offering for freedom.

A curious group of inscriptions, dating from the end of the fourth century or thereabouts, refer to the dedication of a thank-offering by freedmen4. When a slave had acquired his freedom, whether by purchasing himself or by his master’s grace, he was expected to perform certain duties to his old master, chief of which was to choose him for patron5. The enfranchised now took the position of a μέτοικος, and could engage in business. If he failed to perform his bounden duty, an action at law would lie against him6. If the former master prosecuted him under this law, and won his case, the man was sold; if he lost, the man was forever free of obligation. From our inscriptions it would appear that the slave on winning his case presented a silver bowl to Athena. Here we have lists of the bowls kept in the treasury, which all appear to have been inscribed with the necessary particulars; they would serve as an official register of the fact. They were periodically melted down into silver hydriæ, and a record made of the names7. The connexion of these lists with the δίκη ἀποστασίων is shown by the recurring word ἀποφυγὼν or ἀποφυγοῦσα, and by one allusion to the trial8. Men, women, boys, and girls appear as parties; they follow all sorts of occupations—shopman, shopwoman, farmer, hired man, vinedresser, woolspinner, shoemaker, merchant, baker, fishmonger, secretary, harpist. One of the inscriptions is a puzzle. The formula here differs, the citizen's name being in the nominative and the other's in the accusative case. It seems natural to assume that in these cases the citizen won his suit; and for reasons, religious or legal, commemorated the fact in the same way. An enfranchised slave's thank-offering for freedom comes from Thessaly. Freed slaves at Epidaurus dedicated a seat in the stadium.

The practices of the modern Greeks show in many respects an instructive parallel to the ancient worship of the healing gods. Everyone has heard of the famous sanctuary of the Virgin at Tenos, but this is a quite modern foundation, and there are many local shrines less known but no less effective to their end. The most remarkable of all is perhaps the Church of the Virgin at Ayassos in Lesbos. The panegyris falls at the end of the Sarakosté fast, on August the fifteenth (old style), and thousands of persons assemble from the villages of Lesbos and from all Greek settlements within reach. The last night of the fast is kept as a vigil: there is a service in the church, and afterwards all the world dance and make merry, feasting their eyes on the red joints of meat which to-morrow they hope to consume, which in the meanwhile hang tempting on their hooks, covered with pieces of gold and adorned with sprigs.

of leaves. Those who are ill and hope for cure take care to spend the night in the holy precinct. The church stands in a paved quadrangle, the sides being formed by buildings in two stories arranged much like an English College or Inn. The upper floor opens upon a loggia, the lower directly upon the court; the buildings consist of a long series of small cells, with living rooms for the priests, kitchens, stores, and other such necessary apartments. During the panegyris all the cells are filled to overflowing, the balconies and the court itself are strewn with beds, each family with its bundle of rugs, stores of food, and all things needful. Not only that, but the church itself is invaded: the first comers have taken up their abode here, with their blankets and cooking pots, and line the side-aisles and almost every square foot of the floor: there in the church they sleep; and next morning, when the priests march round in solemn procession, the sick ones throw their bodies across the path that the priests may step over them. Every year miraculous cures are said to be wrought here. So too at Tenos, where those who can find room pass the night in a little underground chapel which marks the site where the sacred picture of the Virgin was found. Other shrines have a local reputation, such as the remarkable sanctuary of St Michael of Manda-madhos, also in Lesbos, which can boast of possessing the only image used in the Greek Church, where images are unlawful. Hideous is the archangel, and black as a boot; he is said to be made of plaster, and to be complete, though to outsiders nothing is visible but the head. This curious exception to a strict rule suggests that St Michael has inherited the powers and the form of an earlier deity. But sickness is not confined to the month of August; and those who are so unlucky as to be sick when there is no panegyris to hand, are accustomed to take up their abode in one of these holy quadrangles, or in the nearest monastery, there to remain until they are killed or cured. The priests pray over them regularly, and although no charge is made, the sufferers if cured naturally make what acknowledgment they can: some an offering of value, or even a lock of hair. So it is that all the holy places mentioned, and almost every other church in the Levant, has its store of votive offerings in silver. These are dedicated not only for the cure of disease, but for escape from peril of every kind, especially at sea. In Tenos are a host of silver boats, smacks, barques, brigs, and steamers, modelled in the round, and hanging by strings from the lamps; or made of flat foil, and arranged along the walls in rows. There are also human figures of all ages and ranks: soldiers and sailors, men or women in European dress and others with the Albanian petticoat and leggings, boys and girls, and babies in their cradles or in swaddling clothes, and cradles empty. Here is to be found every conceivable part of the body—hand, ear, leg, heart, breast, whole body or half body naked: animals—horses, cattle, sheep, pigs, turkeys, fowls, and fish: coach and four carriage and pair, horse and cart: trees, barrels, ears of corn: swords, scissors, fiddles, even keys: huts, houses, manufactories with smoking chimneys. Sometimes an attempt is made to represent a scene: in one piece, a patient is represented lying in bed, with the family standing round; in another, a row of men stands, each holding his hat in his left hand and placing his right hand to his breast, a crude method of expressing adoration.

1 Especially the churches in seaports or fishing villages, often sacred to St Nicholas, the patron of sailors, whose icon hangs in every ship. The old cathedral at Athens, sacred to St Eletherios (=Eileithyia?), is a favourite for women in labour. Rings, earrings, parts of the body, children, and ships are found here.

2 A paddle-steamer is inscribed: ὁ πλοιαρχος καὶ τὸ πλήρωμα ἀτμοπλόου Πέτρου Φοσκόλου 6 Δεκεμβρίου 1892. So in Psara, as the historian tells us of the treasure of St Nicholas' church before the Turks destroyed it: ἢσαν διὰν τῶν πλοιάρχων τὰ πλοία...πάντα ἀργυρά...εἰσον δὲ καὶ ἀνεμόμυλον, ὅσ ἀφιέρωσε τυφλὸς τις Ἱμεροβία Συμβάντα τῆς ἀλώσεως τῶν Ψαρρῶν: ἐν Ἑρμοντόλει, 1884, p. 7).

these things are melted down, and a large censer or lamp made out of them, or the proceeds used for the purposes of the church.

So far as I have seen, paintings of this class are never used for dedication in Greek lands, but they are very common in Italy; and for the sake of the ideas implied in them, it may be worth while to examine one collection. This is preserved in the entrance corridor of S. Nicolo in Verona, and consists of about one hundred pictures. All the pictures are much of a size; they are oil paintings of ten to twelve inches square, and coarsely painted. Most of them belong to the eighteenth century, but one bears date as late as 1892. They have on them usually an inscription, the giver's name, the circumstances of his deliverance, and the letters, P. G. R., pro gratia recepta, or per grazia ricevuta, with ex voto appended. They depict all sorts of danger and catastrophe. The commonest type is the patient in sick-bed, with or without the friends praying at the bedside. In the air usually hovers the patron saint, or the Virgin; sometimes a group of heavenly beings is seen in the clouds, and below others in the pangs of purgatory. We see a boy tumbling from a ladder; a child falling down stairs; a man run over by a cart, or a cart falling over a precipice; a building falls, carrying some workmen with it; and so forth. Here are shipwrecked mariners on a raft, while a boat rows up to rescue them. There is an attempted murder outside the amphitheatre at Verona, which is unmistakably portrayed in the background. Two women and a man are welcomed by nuns at a convent door, and the legend informs us that they were led by God's invisible hand. One picture, curiously realistic, represents two scenes, which are placed together without division. In the first, a man drest in tail coat and tall hat sits in a dog-cart drawn by a runaway horse. He looks horribly frightened, throws up his hands in despair, and his tall hat has been knockt to the back of his head. Back to back with this we see the same dog-cart quietly stopt at a door, the man looking happy, and his hat straight again\(^1\). Votive limbs and other offerings like those of ancient times are common not only in Italy but in other parts of the Continent: in France, Austria, Switzerland\(^2\). The church of SS. Giovanni e Paolo, in Venice, has a shrine of S. Vincenzo, who is credited with the power of healing cripples by miracle: near it hang a number of modelled limbs, together with the crutches of grateful patients who no longer had need of them.

\(^2\) Ships at Marseilles; eyes at St Ottilien near Freiburg i. B.; etc. At Marseilles are votive pictures: sick-beds, burning houses, runaway horses, lightning, railway train passing over a bridge, ships in rough weather. Even pictures of limbs in Sta Maria in ara Cieli. Lever describes similar scenes from South America:—"Upon several of the altars, pieces of solid gold and silver lay in security...while lamps of pure silver hung in profusion on every side, surrounded by votive offerings of the same metal—such as shovels, barretas, picks and sieves....Pictures, representing terrible catastrophes, by falling masses of rock, irruptions of torrents, and down-pouring cataracts, showed what fates were ever in store for those who 'forgot the Church.' And as if to heighten the effect, wherever a cayman or a jaguar was 'sloping off with a miner in his mouth,' a respectable saint was sure to be detected in the offing—wiping his eyes in compassion, but not stirring a finger to his assistance."

Sacrifice and offering was customary at each of the two great moments of human life: at marriage and childbirth. We may fairly take it that in prehistoric Greece, as elsewhere, puberty and marriage came close together; and that the offerings originally commemorated puberty, which is a natural change, and not marriage, which is an artificial institution. But in civilised countries the second it is which attracts chief attention, and it is not possible wholly to explain how the Greeks regarded the two as connected.

The most peculiar practice connected with puberty is the dedication of the hair, a very ancient survival which held its own long after the Greeks had outgrown any real faith in their theology. It will be well to collect here the various instances of the practice, although some of them will be obviously due to other occasions than puberty.

The earliest form of the custom would appear to be the vow or dedication of hair to a river, to be cut either at puberty or some other crisis, or after escaping some threatening peril.

The river-worship here, as we have seen it in conjunction with Pan and the nymphs, is a mark of antiquity. Achilles at the funeral of Patroclus shore the locks "long kept for Spercheus, if he should return safe." Ajax made a similar vow to the Ilissus. Orestes laid on his father's tomb the hair he had vowed to Inachus, perhaps one lock of hair left to grow long, as the Brahmins use in India. Similar vows are recorded for the Cephisus and the Neda at Phigalea, and the same is implied by the story of the mythical Leucippus, who was keeping his hair long for the Alpheus. When the great gods come in fashion, they attract this offering like the rest. Thus Agamemnon in perplexity tore out handfuls of hair as an offering to Zeus; hair was also dedicated to Phoebus, Zeus and Artemis, the Heroes, and Health. It was an old custom, says Plutarch, for lads to "offer firstfruits of their hair" at Delphi, and he describes how Theseus went thither for that purpose; the custom is also recorded in history. The hair offering is known at Athens, Argos, Delphi, Delos, Megara, Troezen, Titane,

A special lock seems to have been kept for the sacred purpose\(^8\), and it was so common as to give rise to a proverb\(^9\).

The later records attest the same custom. A child's first hair was so dedicated, with a prayer that he might live to be old, or that Acharnian ivy might afterwards grace his head\(^10\). The first down on a man's chin was also thus dedicated\(^11\). Girls also cut and dedicated their hair before marriage (at puberty, that is, according to the original conception), to Hippolytus at Troezen\(^12\), to Iphinoe at Megara\(^13\), to Athena in Argos\(^14\), and at Delos, where lads and lasses both shore it in honour of the Hyperborean Maidens; the lads winding their hair (or first beard) in wisps of a certain grass, the lasses their hair about a spindle, and laying it upon the maidens' tomb\(^15\). Several Delian inscriptions relate to this. According to Pollux\(^16\) the hair was regularly dedicated before marriage to Hera, Artemis, and the Fates. In the Syrian Hierapolis, Lucian tells us that the hair when offered was preserved in sacred vases; he himself in his hair had conformed to the custom. A series of inscriptions, found at Panamara in Caria, throw some light on the hair-offering. They belong to Roman times, and to Asia Minor; but there is nothing in them which may not be genuine Greek. The devotees enclose their hair in a small stone coffer, made in form of a stele, which is set up in the precinct. A slab covers the hole, and an inscription is placed upon it. The poorer sort are content to make a hole in the wall, or even hang up their hair with the name only attached. Even slaves are among the dedicators. It is peculiar that no women’s names are found at all, though the inscriptions number more than a hundred; and that the deity honoured is Zeus, never Hera. Possibly, as the editors conjecture, women were not allowed within the precinct.

Pausanias saw the statue or relief of a youth shearing his hair in honour of the Cephisus. A curious memorial of the custom is seen in a stone from Thessaly, upon which are carven two long plaits of hair dedicated to Poseidon.

A few further examples may be added from the Anthology to show the variety of possible occasions for this rite. A woman offers the hair to Cybele with a prayer for a happy marriage, or in honour of Pallas on attaining marriage with her lover,

We find dedications of many persons together as xi. 39 ἐπὶ ἵππεως Τιβ. Φλα. The singular κόμη is found sometimes. Formulae are: 61 κόμαι Διονυσίου εὔτυχῶς, 66 τόχῳ ἄγαθη Δί Παναμάρφῳ εὐχήν κόμαι with name, 74 ὑπὲρ εὐχής; indications of a recurring rite no. 80 ὅς κόμαι. and after the birth of a male child desired. A man offers his white hair, having vowed it when dedicating the first locks of his youth. A eunuch after his orgies dedicates his hair to the Sangarian mother. A lock of hair is offered by an elderly courtesan with other gifts to Cypris. So Marcellus on returning to Italy victorious from the east, dedicates the first shaving of his beard. The offering takes a sportive turn, when Lucilius dedicates hair to all the sea deities named in a string, because he has nothing else to give. The growing of sacred hair is also attested for Rome; and Herodotus mentions that the priests of Egypt wore their hair long, and that vows were paid by weighing silver against the shorn hair. He also tells us that the Arabs used to shave their heads in honour of God. The custom is still used, when Arabs offer the hair to God or the heroised dead, and women lay theirs on the tombs of tribal benefactors.

When the Delians place locks of hair on a tomb, they furnish a link with another common occasion of dedicating the hair. Heracles built a tomb for Leucippus, and offered there some of his hair. The AchaeanS used to cut their hair in mourning. Achilles, as I have mentioned, shore his at the funeral of Patroclus; and the soldiers of Masistius, at their leader's death, clipt not their own hair only but the manes of their horses and mules. So did the soldiers of Pelopidas over their leader's corpse. At Hephaestion's death, Alexander the Great had his animals clipt. It will be remembered that hair is among the things offered to heroes. Oddly enough, we are told that the Syracusans shore the captive horses after Nicias was taken. There are several allusions to the custom in the dramatists, and Sappho mentions it.

Further, it was often vowed in time of peril and offered in gratitude. Orestes shore his hair when he came to his senses. Berenice vowed and paid her hair for Ptolemy's safety in war. The statue of Health at Titane was covered with locks of women's hair. A mariner offers his hair to the sea-gods, and Lucian mentions a similar vow. St Paul, it will be remembered, shore his hair at Cenchreae in fulfilment of a vow.

We may now pass on to a general consideration of the marriage offerings in Greece. It is unfortunate that here, as in other things of every day, our information is scanty; but we know that sacrifices were customary before marriage, and where there is sacrifice there may always be votive offerings. In some places initiation formed part of the wedding ceremony, and the priestess of Demeter officiated at weddings. The little girls of Athens used to take part in a ‘mystery’, imitating bears in honour of Artemis Brauronia, whose shrine stood on the Acropolis. The accounts of this rite are confusing, but in one it is said to have been done by all the girls as a preliminary to marriage; and in any case it looks like an ancient ceremony to mark the time of puberty. If another writer be correct in confining the ceremony to a select few, the word δεκατεύειν used as a synonym for ἀρκτεύειν to designate it, suggests that the maidens were a thete of the women, like the tithe of men described above. When marriage actually took place, a sacrifice was made to the gods of marriage, who are variously given as the Furies, Zeus and Hera, Artemis, and the Fates, or the Nymphs, later to Aphrodite. At Sparta, mothers would sacrifice to Hera and Aphrodite when their daughters married. We may assume that, as in other cases, each tribe would originally sacrifice to its own gods; and that the country folk, perhaps following the oldest custom, would sacrifice to the nymphs or heroes. But as theology became systematic, Zeus and Hera as the divine wedded pair seem to have gained the chief importance as patrons of wedlock. Hera, indeed, as the Maid, the Wife, and the Widow, represents the whole life of woman on earth; and the Holy Marriage ceremonial is connected with her and Zeus at Samos and elsewhere. This ceremonial is perhaps commemorated by a terra-cotta group from Samos, probably representing Zeus and Hera as bridegroom and bride, which we may suppose to have been dedicated at some human marriage. The principle would be that of mythological precedent; and that it was natural here is seen not only from a comparison of parallels, but by the fact that Sappho in an epithalamium sings of a mythological wedding. Perhaps this is the origin of an Athenian painted tablet, which bears the apotheosis of Heracles.

The sacrifice of a pig before marriage is attested by Varro for the Greeks of Italy; and an inscription to be quoted below may refer to this. Perhaps the dedication of a garland to Hera, which Alcman speaks of, may refer to the marriage feast.

Some legendary dedications are connected with marriage, and are of interest as showing how natural the practice was felt to be. Pelops, when he prayed for success in his suit for Hippodamia, dedicated in Temnus an image of Aphrodite made of a growing myrtle tree. Theseus, when he took Helen to wife, built a temple of Bridal Aphrodite. He also dedicated in Delphi a statuette of Aphrodite which he got from Ariadne, and set up portraits of Ariadne in Cyprus. Menelaus, after sacking Troy and recovering Helen, set up statues of Thetis and Praxidica (‘exacter of punishment’) hard by the temple of Aphrodite Migonitis in Gythium. This temple was reputed as the foundation of Paris himself for the rape of Helen: let those believe it who will, and those who will not, may choose. Icarius commemorated the wooing of Odysseus by an image of Modesty.
Odysseus himself founded two temples after vanquishing the competitors for Penelope’s hand, but the motive must remain doubtful. Equally legendary, no doubt, was the temple to Aphrodite Callipygos built by the two maidens who were so proud of their figures, when they obtained rich husbands. Charmus, a lover of Hippias, is said to have built an altar to Love in the Academe.

Maidens before marriage, originally perhaps at puberty, were accustomed to dedicate along with their hair the dolls and other toys of their past childhood, on the same principle as the warrior dedicates his worn-out arms, or the workman his tools. They also offered their veils, or with obvious symbolism their girdles. Thus the Troezenian girls offered their girdles to Apaturian Athena. Timaretta, in an epigram which appears to have been copied from the stone, mentions drest dolls, ball, tambourine, and her own headdress. Similar dedications occur of garlands, girdle, mirror, and µίτραι. Alcibiē (perhaps the well-known courtezan) dedicates her hair-net to Hera on obtaining a lawful marriage. So Calliteles, on coming of age, consecrates to Hermes his hat, buckle, cloke, ball, scraper, bow and arrows; Philocles to the same god ball, rattle, knuckle-bones, and bull-roarer.

Such things as these, being perishable and not precious, could not have survived in any numbers. Yet jointed dolls were found at Delos, in the shrine of the hero Amynus, and

The story is of significance as throwing light on the distinctive epithets of the gods. Καλλιπυγός is not meant to describe Aphrodite, but to recall the occasion.

In the Pelopium at Olympia were found a number of miniature bronze kettles, cymbals, small axes, and the like, some of which may have been toys\(^8\), and a miniature bucket of silver in the sanctuary of Athena Cranaia\(^9\); but all these may be better explained on the principle to be set forth later\(^10\). The inventories include such things, but there is nothing to show why they were offered; we may however claim as toys the Delian rattles\(^11\), the tops of Oropus\(^12\), perhaps also four little snakes and Timothea's crab\(^13\).

It is probable that three dedications to Limnatis belong to this place; several small cymbals have been found in Laconia, which were probably children's toys\(^14\). A fourth, the much discussed offering of Camo, is probably dedicated to the same deity for the same cause\(^15\). All the dedicators are women.

DOMESTIC LIFE.

There is a pair of cymbals, dedicated by a man to the same deity, and one by a man to Asclepius. On this principle I would explain the woman's dedication in Plataea of "what she had on," her trinkets probably to judge from the context.

I do not know what to make of the bridal baskets, the bridal cauldron, and the bridegroom's footstool mentioned in the Athenian Inventories. There is no proof that these were votive offerings, but they may be such.

At marriage, prayers and vows were offered for fruitfulness and prosperity. It seems likely that a relief from Sicily of the second century, dedicated by a man and woman to Artemis, was offered on the occasion of marriage. Artemis Euphraxia is clad in a chiton which leaves bare the right breast; in her right hand she holds a torch, in her left a basket; before her stands an altar. We may suggest the same explanation of Polystrata's offering, an Argive relief of the fifth century, showing Artemis alone clad in Doric chiton, with bow, quiver, and torch; and of others which show the goddess with her usual attributes, and a female worshipper, or with male and female.

At childbirth, prayer and vow were made to various deities, no doubt to any patron deity of a tribe or a family. Hera and Artemis are the favourites. A late inscription from Paros names a whole group of divinities: Hera, Demeter, Thesmophoros, the Maid, Zeus Eubuleus and Babo. Asclepius was also invoked by the would-be mother\(^1\). On such occasions a title appropriate would be added, as Couriotrophos to Athena\(^2\) and Demeter\(^3\), Epilysamene to Demeter\(^4\), Eileithyia to Hera\(^5\) and to Artemis\(^6\), Lecheia to Artemis; and it appears that Eileithyia and Lecho are titles of the divine powers, personified as the protectors of childbirth\(^7\). The spirits who preside over childbirth were also called Genetyllides\(^8\). The scanty evidence goes to show that the prayer for a safe delivery was often accompanied by the dedication of a veil or hair-net or some such trifle\(^9\). Articles of dress were also offered after the birth: sandals it might be, or a part of the robe, a girdle, a breast-band\(^10\). Later we find these offerings made to Aphrodite; the girl in Theocritus intended her breast-band for this purpose\(^11\). The clothes of women who died in childbirth were left at the grave of Iphigenia in Halae\(^12\). Herodotus says that women made a special practice of dedicating their pins in Argos and Aegina\(^13\). Perhaps some of the dresses dedicated to Artemis Brauronia or to an unknown deity at Thebes were due to childbirth or the like\(^14\); and the beautiful pins, earrings, fibulae and diadems of Lysi in Arcadia, offered to Artemis\(^15\). There seems to have been a kind of churching for women, sitting publicly in the shrine of Eileithyia\(^16\).

Eleusia, or Lecho, are not uncommon\(^1\), but what was the thing dedicated does not appear. A woman offers a bowl to Eleithyia in Delos\(^2\), and an amphora in Peiraeus to the Nursing Mother\(^3\). The Acropolis vases dedicated to Aphrodite have been already mentioned\(^4\).

Existing remains are few. We may perhaps regard as a wife's offering the silver pin dedicated to Hera which was found in Argolis\(^5\), and a gilded bronze pin from Cyprus\(^6\). Innumerable brooches, pins, armlets, and suchlike ornaments have been found in the Argive Heraeum\(^7\), and one of the mirrors is inscribed with a woman's dedication\(^8\). A number of women's ornaments are mentioned in the inventories, but it is impossible to decide upon what occasion offered. In Delos we find Melitta's crystal or glass unguent box\(^9\), a bronze mirror\(^10\), golden pins\(^11\), and buttons, earrings, necklets or armlets, headbands, fly-flappers, and rouge-pots\(^12\). In a shrine on the Acropolis slope, probably the Asclepieum, we find mention of earrings\(^13\). Perhaps it was on such an occasion that Roxana sent a gold vase and necklet to Athens\(^14\). The shrine of Athena Cranaia has yielded up a gold bangle\(^15\), with buckles, hair-pins, spirals, and fibulae of bronze\(^16\). At Dodona was found a mirror dedicated by a woman\(^17\). A glass ring and toilet-casket, inscribed to Habrothaus, have been found in Cyprus\(^18\).

As regards the other offerings made on this occasion, we read of one or two temples which were due to it. Helen, after bringing forth a daughter, is said to have founded a temple of Eileithyia in Argos. Again, the women of Elis, long barren, when at length they found themselves with child, built one to Athena the Mother. The image of the protecting deity here as elsewhere is a natural offering. Phaedra is said to have dedicated two ancient statues of Eileithyia. A statue of Artemis offered at childbirth is attested by an inscription. There exists also a late statuette of Eileithyia dedicated by a woman; and a pillar inscribed with the name of Asclepius probably supported a statue of him dedicated on the like occasion. Perchance the archaic statue of Artemis, dedicated at Delos by a woman, belongs to this class. Little altars are often dedicated to Artemis the Nurse in Roman times.

Three ancient reliefs from Argos are dedicated to the Eumenides by women, and the connexion of these beings with childbirth has been already indicated. The three goddesses stand, holding each a snake in the right hand and a flower in the left, with worshippers in their presence. A relief of two female figures with torches may refer to this occasion.

The most characteristic records of this occasion are those which represent the act or process blest by the god. This class is represented by groups of statuary or small figures, and by reliefs. An archaic marble statue from Sparta represents a female figure kneeling, with a small male figure on her right holding one hand to his lips, while on the other a second male figure presses his hand over the woman's womb. It should be remembered that women in ancient Greece knelt to bring forth a child\(^1\). These two guardian daemons are doubtless assisting at the birth, one as a midwife does, the other signing for silence from inauspicious words\(^2\). A statue in a similar pose comes from Myconos\(^3\), and a relief from Cyprus\(^4\). Nude female figures, apparently lying down, with one hand held to the breast, have been found at Naucratis; and these were perhaps thank-offerings for childbirth\(^5\). An ivory casket from Athens unmistakably portrays a birth. The newly-delivered mother kneels on the ground, and by her side stands a female figure, much damaged, which supports her with one hand. As this figure holds a lance or staff she is interpreted to be Athena. The midwife is bathing the babe. On the left another female figure is standing, half-draped, with a long staff in the left hand, and in her right she holds a jug. I suggest that this casket may have been dedicated as a mother’s thank-offering, although there is nothing to prove it\(^6\). Perhaps I might venture to suggest further, that the female figure of gold sent by Croesus to Delphi, and called locally his ‘baker-woman,’ was really a woman (his queen perhaps) in the attitude of childbirth, which might easily be mistaken for one kneading dough, or even so miscalled in jest. It should be noted that his queen’s girdles and trinkets are mentioned along with it\(^7\).

6 Schöne 149, who refers it to the child Dionysus. I differ entirely from him; the scene as sketch has every appearance of a transcript from real life. In the sketch, the kneeling figure appears to be naked from the waist down. She is pouring water from a jug into the basin. Without seeing the original it is impossible to judge how far the reproduction is accurate; but I see no trace of an aegis, and if the ‘lance’ were not so clear this figure would be better taken as a midwife or an attendant. The figure on the right may then be Hecate or Eileithyia with a torch.
7 Herod. i. 51 γυναικὸς εἰδὼλον χρυσοῦς τρίπτηρον, τὸ Δελφοὶ τῆς ἄρτοκτον τῆς Κροίσου εἰκών. Μέγας εἶναι. πρὸς δὲ καὶ τῆς ἐσωτερικοὶ γνωσίμοι τὰ ἀπὸ τῆς δείρησις ἀνέθηκε ὁ Κροίσος καὶ τὰς ἱέρας. Compare the dedication in Plataea, Ἦλυχα τὰ ἐφ’ αὐτῆς, AJA vii. 406 74.—It is fair to add that Plutarch says this baker had saved Croesus’ life, and the figure was dedicated in gratitude, Pyth. Or. 10.
Other reliefs show different moments. Some from Cyprus have the figure of a woman seated upon a chair, and holding a swathed infant. There is fruit in one hand, and beside her a child stands, also holding a fruit. In a relief from Sigeum, the enthroned figure seems to represent Eileithyia or some suitable divinity: to her approach three women bearing infants upon their arms, and a fourth with a dish or casket. One 'harpist' relief may belong to this place. Apollo, holding lyre and bowl, stands beside Artemis (who pours a libation), Leto and a female figure who is inscribed Κοὐροτρόφος holding a torch; a male worshipper stands near, holding up one hand. An archaic Italian relief in terra-cotta, where Aphrodite holds Eros on her arm, is too vague to interpret.

An attempt has been made to show that the mysterious relief of the Acropolis, where Athena is seen leaning upon a spear in an attitude of grief, and contemplating a square pillar with nothing upon it, is really a dedication to her as Nursing Mother. A vase is cited which shows a similar scheme, but a child's figure is upon the pillar, and the pillar bears a dedicatory inscription. The child's figure on the relief is assumed to have been painted. If this be correct (and it is most ingenious), the relief will be an example of 'divine precedent'; for Athena is supposed to be contemplating the infant Erichthonius. To the same occasion M. Lechat assigns a relief of the fourth century, where a babe lies on the ground between Demeter and the Maid; one which shows a man and a small child before Athena; and one where are a man and wife, with a child in a tub or basket on the ground. These he interprets to represent the ceremony of the father's acknowledgment.

The act or process is also represented by small figures of nursing mothers, which cannot be meant for the deity. Many have been found in Sicily and Paestum, and although the place of their finding is not conclusive, they were probably a votive type. One of them appears to represent a woman in child-bed. We know that the Sicilians used to pray to the Mothers and make them rich offerings. In Cyprus, a great many have been found within temple precincts. In one case the infant holds up its hand in the familiar attitude of adoration. Sometimes a female figure enthroned holds the infant. The figure of a woman erect, holding a child on her arm, was found in an ancient shrine of the healing hero Amythus at Athens. A large archaic group of a woman suckling a child comes from Sparta; and statuettes with the same subject have been found on the Acropolis of Athens. One mother, in Roman times, dedicates an image of her breast to Aphrodite, a cruder hint of the idea. From the Argive Heraeum comes the unmistakable figure of a pregnant woman, but I know no parallel.

The modern Greek regularly dedicates her silver babe, in its swaddlings, or even the cradles they lie in, made of the same metal; and it seems to us natural that the ancients should

It does not appear that in early times an official dedicated a thank-offering for his office as a matter of course. Only a few instances are found, and we should regard these as due to the same feeling of gratitude which prompts freewill offerings in other cases. In the sixth century we find two altars which may be referred to such an occasion. At Athens the Peisistratids, we are told, kept up the old forms of government, but took care that one of themselves should be archon; and Peisistratus, son of Hippias, who held this office under his father, set up an altar in the market-place to the Twelve Gods, and one to Apollo in the Pythium\(^1\), the inscription of which still remains\(^2\). Another altar from Amorgos bears an inscription of the same date, recording that it was the offering of two archons\(^3\). An archon of Ceos makes a thank-offering to Aphrodite\(^4\). In the year 408/7 the Athenian prytanes of the Erechtheid tribe made a joint dedication to the

It is stated that the Athenian college of archons used to dedicate an inscribed herm in the Street of Hermes if they had reason to be proud of themselves; and when the Long Walls were begun, they did erect a statue of Hermes. A state herald dedicates a statue of Hermes for a memorial. There is a pillar dedicated on the Acropolis before 480 by an overseer of moneys. Herodotus saw a tripod at Thebes, reputed to have been dedicated by Laodamas to Apollo during his rule. Pausanias also dedicated at Byzantium a bronze bowl as a memorial of his rule. There is even apparently one of that class of offerings which indicates the human activity or process blest by the god: the figure of a man seated, and apparently writing upon tablets, which may be that of a recorder or temple steward, found upon the Athenian citadel. Probably we should also add the ancient statue of Chares, potentate of Teichiusa, which he set up at Branchidae to the glory of Apollo; whether this be regarded as another instance of the plastic representation of human activity, or (in view of the eastern character) as mere self-glorification.

Later, the number of these dedications increases so enormously, that it appears to become the regular thing that an official should make an offering on taking or leaving office. It is in the fourth century that this change begins, and it coincides with other changes in the old simple ways, which rob the votive offering of its grace and moral worth, and turn it into a formality. There are indications that these offerings, with those for victory in the games, were even made compulsory by law. A decree of an Attic deme exists which is not likely to be unique in Attica. It appears that the deme, whether by battle, earthquake, or other cause, had fallen on evil days, so that money was scarce for religious purposes; and it was consequently decided that every person elected to an office should pay a contribution. The decree proposes a vote of thanks to a man who had undertaken to help in rebuilding the shrines and in placing offerings in them. A similar record comes from Caria. Here the dedication has become a duty, like the liturgies; and that it was also regarded as a personal honour is clear from inscriptions which expressly give leave to dedicate. Thus the freewill gratitude of earlier days has given place to a feeling which is partly public spirit and partly pride. We are not surprised, therefore, to find dedications made not only to the gods, but to the people.

At Athens, the Senate appears to have made a yearly dedication to Athena at Athens, and perhaps to the goddesses at Eleusis. One altar exists dedicated by them to Aphrodite Guide of the People and to the Graces. We now find these dedications made by the Archon, the Basileus, the Polemarch, Demetrius of Phalerum, on being chosen Epistates, makes his offering with the rest\(^18\). The gymnasiarch at the Dionysia appears once at least to have dedicated tripods\(^19\). Officials of a guild dedicate a great silver goblet\(^20\), with many fine offerings\(^21\). The ephebes by custom offered a silver bowl at the Eleusinian Mysteries\(^22\), to the Mother of the gods\(^23\), to Dionysus\(^24\), as it would appear in short at all the great public feasts they were concerned in; the cosmete would join in the offering\(^25\), and the gymnasiarch dedicate arms\(^26\). The ephebes make a dedication to Hermes when their training is over\(^27\).

In other parts of the Greek world we find the same practice observed within the same limits of time; for earlier days there is no evidence. The earliest official dedication of a prytany outside Attica comes from Corecyra in the fourth or third century

The Damiorgi of Megara\textsuperscript{3}, and all the public officials of Acrae\textsuperscript{4} and Himera\textsuperscript{5} in Sicily, make joint offerings to Aphrodite. or that the state did this for them; but although statues of these officials existed, there is no information as to who dedicated them, and on what occasion. Most of this class are honorable and of late date\(^1\). This is however the proper place to mention that the statues of the priestesses of Hera at Argos, but of what period is not plain, were seen before her temple\(^2\). The same is related of the temple of Demeter at Hermion\(^3\), and the shrine of the Eumenides at Ceryneia in Achaia\(^4\). There is some evidence for priestly statues at Athens (and the figure of Lysimachus has been claimed for one\(^5\)), but not enough to show custom. The Butadae, a very ancient Athenian clan descended from the early kings, furnisht the priestesses of Athena Polias and the priestesses of Erechtheus, who were both worship in the Erechtheum. Paintings of the Butadae were on the walls of that temple\(^6\), and wooden statues of the orator Lycurgus and his sons (who belonged to the family) were also there\(^7\). Habron dedicated their pedigree on his election to the priesthood, and no doubt all the statues had reference to this right. A priest's statue stood in the temple of Artemis at Cnidus\(^8\). If this really was an early custom, the statues were doubtless properly characterised, and will have represented the priest's function in plastic form. Mere portraits they could not have been.

In later times priestly dedications are very common. Hierarchs\(^9\), priests\(^10\), overseers of sacrifice\(^11\), and their staff\(^12\) occur amongst these, but the usual designation is vague\(^13\). The inferior temple officials, such as ζύκορος₁, πυρφόρος², στεφαν-φόρος³, ιυδροφόρος⁴, προφήτης⁵, are not wanting, nor the band-master himself⁶ and the sacred crier⁷. A whole group often act together; as in the dedication to Zeus Soter and Aphrodite, apparently made after some games⁸, or in the sacrificial body mentioned above⁹, or these and the mystae in Samothrace¹⁰.

The priest of Apollo at Thebes often, if not regularly, used to dedicate a tripod¹¹. The sacrificial staff at Cos appears to have made periodic dedications¹². A woman who carried the jar of water in the rites at Branchidae, dedicated a vessel of some sort in memory of the occasion¹³.

The occasion of these offerings cannot be distinctly made out: it cannot be stated, that is, how far they were thank-offerings for election to the office, and how far due to special occasions. The formula now and then seems to indicate that the election itself is the reason¹⁴; and a similar idea perhaps suggested Peisistratus’ altar¹⁵. But such phrases as ‘thank-offering’ tell us nothing¹⁶, while those which were made in obedience to a dream¹⁷ do not belong to this place at all. It is fair to assume that where the aorist participle is used, the offering has a direct reference to the office¹⁸; the present participle implies only that the dedicator was in office at the time. It is possible that where the present participle is used, all, as certainly some, were paid for out of the temple funds and that the dedicator was acting officially for the hierarchy\(^1\). These refer perhaps to buildings or repairs, consecrated thus by the officials\(^2\).

A key to the occasion is found in a large class of decrees which record a vote of thanks past to an official after his term, which was usually accompanied by a crown\(^3\), either of leaves or of gold, according to the importance of the person. The recipient seems to have made a sacrifice of thanksgiving\(^4\), and he naturally wished to commemorate the occasion in some way. Megacles of Rhamnus dedicates a statue to Themis on receipt of this honour from his demesmen\(^5\); the usual thing was to dedicate the crown at least. The fact is frankly recognised in an inscription which records the gift of a crown to Spartocus and Pairisades, of Bosporus, in 346, who as foreigners might have neglected the wholesome use: they are directed to dedicate their crowns on the Acropolis forthwith\(^6\).

This custom explains the immense number of crowns recorded in the Inventories. One of the Athenian lists, from the latter part of the fourth century, consists wholly of such crowns dedicated by the recipients\(^7\); three of the persons mentioned, Nausicles, Neoptolemus, and Charidemus, are stated by Demo- sthenes to have received honorific crowns\(^8\). Dedications, certainly or probably including the crowns, are made by bodies of Men in common: by "archons and parasiti" at Pallene; by the senate of Athens in recompense for its services; by a board of arbitrators which has given satisfaction; by the Prytanes of the tribe which has best approved itself in the tribal competition; by bodies of thiasotes or orgeons. A decree of Minoa ordains that each year the officials who did sacrifice in the most magnificent way should be crowned. Here is a man thus honoured by a public vote of the senate, the soldiers, and the deme; there is a general so honoured, or the trainer of a band of youths, or a guild official. Bare justice and upright dealing is cause sufficient, or even public spirit. Several crowns conferred by the Athenians upon distinguishing men are found amongst those dedicated on the Acropolis; amongst others, one of Alexander the Great, and one of the Paonian Tisamenæ. Lysander after the defeat of the Athenians received crowns from many cities; and crowns are known to have been dedicated by him both at Delos, and, by a refinement of insult, at Athens also. Conon after his victory over the Lacedaemonians, and Chabrias after the sea-fight off Naxos, dedicated crowns on the Acropolis, which may be assigned to a similar occasion. Amongst the donors in the Delian treasure lists is Pharax, doubtless the Spartan admiral who aided Dercyllidas in the invasion of Caria (397): he offers a gold crown to Apollo Pythian. Another crown is set down to Ameinondas, perhaps a mistake for Epameinondas, who occurs in a different list, if we may suppose the inscription to have been damaged. Other dedications at Delos are Callicrates, King Demetrius, Antipater, Philocles King of Sidon, and Polycleitus admiral of Ptolemy. A golden circlet, offered by Datis at Delos, may be mentioned here; although whether Datis were the Persian leader, or what the occasion of the offering, does not appear. Flamininus, after his victories in Greece, sent a gold crown to Delphi; and L. Cornelius Scipio one to Delos. Four crowns were dedicated by Nero in Olympia, but these were probably his prizes.

Golden crowns were commonly presented to the Athenian people by states which had cause to be grateful to them, and these also were dedicated on the Acropolis. What pride the Athenians took in these memorials is told us by Demosthenes. "I think all of you," he says, "have seen the red letters inscribed under these crowns, setting forth how The Allies crowned the Athenian people for its courage and uprightness, or The Euboeans saved and set free crowned the people." In the fourth century we find these crowns of honour presented to the people by Andros, Arethusa, Carthage, Eleans, Erythrae, 1

Mytilene, Samos, perhaps Thasos and Naxos, by Boeotia, Alopeconnese, Chersonese, and Samothrace, and by the soldiers in Sciaithus. Methymna sends a flute-case. Paros sends a crown to the Boule. Others come from Myrrhina, Tenedos, Pontus. Similarly, a golden crown given by Athens to the sanctuary at Oropus was dedicated there.

It is but a short step from these to the honorific statues, which in the later ages and especially under the Roman rule meet us in swarms. The dedication of these is a departure from the simple thanksgiving of the older worshippers, which recognised only the divine help, to a feeling which soon degenerates into flattery or self-glorification. It was in fact an honour pure and simple, so that decrees are past giving the right to dedicate. We see the beginning of the practice in the dedication of the statues of victorious athletes, and in those of groups containing victorious generals and deliverers; and by their side we may place a few others which are not undeserved. The difference is, that they commemorate rather a general respect and feeling that honour is due, than a special delivery where the man may be looked on as the instrument of God. This seems to be the origin of the statues of Epaminondas, several of which are mentioned. One the Thebans dedicated in Thebes, with an inscription which sums up his achievements; there was another in the sanctuary at Epidaurus, and a third in Messene. Several statues or reliefs were erected to Polybius, for his services done to Greece after the conquest; at Mantinea, Megalopolis, Acacesium.

Pallantium¹, Tegea², Olympia³, and Cleitor⁴: and certain exiles, who had been befriended by Aratus, did the same for him⁵. Statues of Isocrates were dedicated at Eleusis by a friend⁶, and at Athens by his adopted son⁷. Pupils dedicated the statues of their masters. Thus in Peiraeus, sacred to the Muses, were statues of Artemon, Dionysius, Philetaerus⁸; in Athens, Attalus II and Ariarathes V set up a statue of Carneades, who taught them philosophy⁹. A well-known story tells how Pyrrhias went so far as to sacrifice an ox to his benefactor¹⁰.

To enumerate the world of honorific statues or pictures¹¹ which are attested by inscriptions would serve no useful purpose; but it may be worth while to give a few examples of their kinds. The ground of the dedication is either some specific act of generosity or service, or even the vaguest good life¹² or good citizenship¹³. The people, or the senate and the people, dedicate statues of officials who have done their duty; thus Salamis does honour to her general¹⁴, Athens to her taxarch¹⁵, trierarch¹⁶, or admiral¹⁷. The members of a deme erect the statue of a gymnasiarch¹⁸. The troops on service at Phyle and Eleusis dedicate a statue of their captain to Demeter at Eleusis¹⁹, mentioning on the same slab his victories in the games, as one might add a man’s titles or degrees. The ephebes honour their trainer, and the senate both trainer and Even the upright judge and the ambassador are not forgotten; an official is dedicated by his colleagues. There seems to be absolutely no kind of service which might not be recognised in this way. It becomes indeed so commonplace a compliment, that parents dedicate the statues of children, children of parents, and mothers, grandfathers, sisters, brothers, uncles, husbands, wives, even nurses, are found among the dedicators or dedicated. Commonly these statues were erected in sacred precincts; but when the sacred character of the dedication was obscured, they came to be set up in the gymnasion or the market square or in any place which might be convenient. These statues are seen all over the Greek world; and in particular, the Roman emperors were put up everywhere with a rivalry of adulation, being coupled with gods, called Hero and Founder, or even themselves divine. It may be worth while to mention one peculiar case, that of Artemidorus of Perga in Pamphylia, who was a prominent citizen of Thera under Ptolemy Euergetes. He seems to have had a mania for building altars. Having served in an expedition against the Troglydtes, he built an altar to Pan of the Safe Journey, which was found in Nubia. In Thera he built altars to Hecate, Priapus, and the Dioscuri; and cut a number of others out of the native rock, inscribed to 'Ομόνοια, the Samothracian gods, and others, in verses which he doubtless thought elegant, in all which the name of Artemidorus is prominent. The consequence was that the Therans crowned him, and set up a memorial of himself which was to last "as long as the stars shine in the sky, or the solid earth remains."

As regards the objects dedicated, there is little to say. I have already mentioned statues, crowns, and altars. Once or twice we find an inspector of markets most appropriately dedicating his measures and weights, the measures being cut into a stone table; and it is clear that the object of the dedication was not thanksgiving or prayer, but simply a record of fair dealing. Priests and temple officials, so far as we can learn, seem to have chosen such things as would be useful in the temple; such as a number of stone tables for playing at draughts, or stone lavers, which have been found at Epidaurus. The same idea may have suggested an omphalos dedicated to Apollo in Rhodes. Now and then the inscription names the gift, as one from Crete names a human statue and a gold crown.

In later times a large number record buildings put up or repaired or something done for the beautifying of the temple property. It would appear to be one of the prerogatives of office to pay for any necessary repairs, which were regarded as 'dedicated' by the official. Thus we find seats or an exedra erected, a fountain with images beside it, shrines, porticoes, even a proscenium and pillars. A gymnasiarch of Cythera commemorates his tenure of office by dedicating a vapour-bath and an arena to Hermes. Dedications are found of pillars, pediment, and screen, of a stage in the theatre of Dionysus, windows or doors, colonnades, a fountain and conduit, a wine-fat, a round-house, guest-rooms, a treasure-chest, and chambers or shrines. Even two large tiles are dedicated by two persons, whose calling is uncertain, and a clock in Cos was dedicated to Good Luck, the Good Spirit, and the people. On the same principle, the ephebes were in later days expected to make certain contributions to the public good; amongst them, the gift of a hundred volumes to the 'Ptolemaeum.' These they are said to 'dedicate,' but in doing so they obeyed a law.

MEMORIALS OF FEASTS AND CEREMONIALS
TOGETHER WITH HUMAN AND DIVINE FIGURES, MODELS OF ANIMALS, AND INDETERMINATE RELIEFS.

Very many of the recorded dedications cannot be assigned to any of the above classes, and it will be convenient to group the more important of them together now as memorials of recurrent festivals. Since an offering might commemorate any rite which a worshipper took part in, so at certain customary feasts it was the custom to make a dedication, public or private, in a general spirit of thanksgiving and prayer. It is possible that many of the dedications we are now to speak of were given on some occasion of private importance, but there is nothing to show it, and hence provisionally they are placed here. That votive offerings were to be expected at festival times is clear from the Andanian inscription¹, not to mention other indications.

The ancient Greek sanctuaries had naturally their special celebrations yearly on fixed days, as a modern church observes the holy day of the saint. It seems to have been a common

often hideous or without form, was deckt out on solemn occasions with magnificent robes of state. Such robes would be an appropriate offering, whether in time of special need, or at intervals when the old robes were worn out. For worn out they were, inasmuch as they would be worn from time to time, and washed, and thord, and perhaps regularly discarded, as is still done in India. The earliest mention of such customs is found in the Iliad, where Hecuba propitiates Athena by the gift of the finest robe in her stores; which by the priestess is laid on the goddess’s knees\(^1\). The statues of Eileithyia in Attica were draped\(^2\). Amongst the catalogues of temple treasures are lists of sacred robes belonging to different sanctuaries. There is one list of the divine robes from Samos,—tunics, girdles, veils, clokes, and so forth\(^3\); there are others of those belonging to Artemis Brauronia at Athens, for whose wardrobe the English language is insufficient\(^4\); dress of Athena at Lindos\(^5\) is also mentioned, and of Dione at Dodona\(^6\), to whom the Athenians sent a whole outfit; Asclepius at Titane was clad in a woollen shirt and a mantle\(^7\); and there is no reason to suppose that these were exceptional, especially in view of the practice of other nations\(^8\). Garments were offered to the Cabiri in Bocotia\(^9\); Laodice sent from Cyprus a robe to Athena at Tegea, in memory of her ancestral connexion with Arcady\(^10\); King Amasis sent an embroidered linen tunic to Athena of Lindos\(^11\), and another to Samian Hera\(^12\). A statue said to have been once worship as Poseidon, seen by Pausanias in the city of Olympia, wore clothes of linen and wool\(^13\). Alcman’s Partheneion seems to commemorate the dedication of a robe to Artemis Orthia by women. In the great pompas described by Athenaeus, the divine and heroic figures are quite naturally drest.

We see then in the famous peplos at Athens no isolated offering, but a kind which was probably more general than we now know. It was presented at the Panathenaea, which included a harvest thanksgiving, sacrifices to Athena Health and Athena Victory, a watchnight and dances; which feast being celebrated in autumn appears to be an old agricultural feast with such additions as city life would suggest. The great ship, which was drawn in procession with the peplos outstrech as a sail, looks towards the imperial power of Athens won at sea. But although there are thus late elements in the feast, its origin was older than the Athenian empire, older perhaps than the city of Athens itself. Although Peisistratus was the first to make the dedication of the peplos customary, we may infer from the other evidence that he did not invent the practice. At this feast, chosen maidens of Athens, the Ergastinae, under the priestess and two Arrhephori, embroidered the robe with the exploits of Athena; and in the procession were other maidens bearing baskets upon their heads (canephoroi). Besides the peplos itself, other offerings were sometimes given by the maidens thus honoured, but the examples do not come from early times. An inscription giving a list of the Ergastinae records that the people dedicated a bowl in memory of their public spirit. Often the maidens who took a prominent part in the ceremony had their statues dedicated, in later times at least; and a number of the bases have been found which once bore arrhephoroi. A girl who bore water in the sacred feast of Branchidae offers a piece of tapestry to Artemis; and small figures of water-bearers are known in Tegea. A priest at Magnesia on the Maeander dedicates a hydria.

Two other dedications of the same kind as the peplos are recorded. Sixteen Elean women every four years made a similar robe and dedicated it to Hera at Olympia; and at Amyclae, women made a tunic for Apollo.

Priests and priestesses seem occasionally to have dedicated their own robes or ornaments, used on solemn occasions. Such occasions were no doubt commemorated by the toilet reliefs of late date, found near Amyclae; on which are carven mirror, torch, spindle, phial, a nest of boxes, pestle and mortar, knife, strigil, bottle, two bodkins, a pair of shoes, a cap, and other like objects. The dedications of robes to Brauronian Artemis may be similar, and the marble footstool dedicated by a priestess to Demeter at Cnidus. We shall see that the mystae dedicated their garments at Eleusis. It seems likely that the stlengides of the Sybarites were dedicated at Delphi as part of the ceremonial costume; and possibly a series of bronze fillets found in Laconia were dedicated to Apollo Hyperteleatas by the priests whose names they bear, although it is true the formula of dedication is wanting. A stlengis found at Dodona, with a nonsensical inscription, which seems to refer to ritual, is a real scraper. When the θησαυρός or offertory-box was

It is natural to suppose that a sacred embassy, which undoubtedly performed sacrifice, brought also some offerings for dedication; and there is not a little evidence which points that way. It is recorded that an Athenian who conducted an embassy to Delphi took a tripod with him². Hyperides gives details of one of these sacred missions.³ From Demosthenes we learn that the Athenians were on one occasion commanded by an oracle of Dodona to deck out the statue of Dione, and to send certain victims, a bronze table, and the gift which the Athenian people had offered.⁴ A phiale or bowl appears from our records to have been the usual gift of a theory. Cyzicus sends a bowl to Branchidae, yearly if we may argue from the scanty evidence;⁵ and occasional dedications are recorded from the theori from Ephesus,⁶ of those from king Ptolemy and the people of Alexandria,⁷ of kings Prusias, Seleucus, Antiochus,⁸ and Queen Camasarya.⁹ A tribal offering is also mentioned.¹⁰ In one year were dedicated at Branchidae silver bowls from Alinda, Carthage, Chalcis, Chios, Clazomenae, Cos, Cyzicus,

Or did he fetch the sacred fire, as the Lemnians did each year (Philostr. Her. xix. 14)? So did the allies: C I A i. 37.

Erythrae, Iasus, Megalopolis, Mylasa, Myrrhina, Rhodes and Smyrna. At the public feasts of Delos too, foreign cities and potentates regularly sent their offerings. Thus the islands of Cos, Calymnos, and Rhodes sent a bowl thither year by year in the hands of their theoroi. So too the kings of Egypt and Macedon, less regularly of Syria. We have mention of Ptolemy, and Berenice, Demetrius, Stratonice, Philocles of Sidon, and others.

The temple officials dedicated bowls yearly at the feasts of Eutychea and Philadelphsea; and from the names of other vessels it would appear that private persons may have left a sum of money for such a yearly gift, as the mediaeval Christians founded their chantries. Delian women, the dancers at the feast, appear again and again offering a crown; and the Thys- tidae and Ocyniade, two Delian trittyes, offer a bowl each year.

It will be convenient here to gather together some vases with dedications upon them: again not to assume that they all commemorate a ritual act, but that they may. Often, no doubt, vases were dedicated for their own worth, and we have seen that there were many occasions when such offerings were made. Some of them were dedicated by priests, as in the Boeotian Cabirium. A number of bronze vessels on the Acropolis of Athens bear dedications, but many of these were firstfruits. In the same place was found a vase of pottery, with the formula of dedication painted upon it; this contains a picture of Artemis, and in the missing part there is room for her name. One Acropolis vase is inscribed Of the Good God.

In Boeotia a few have lately been found, inscribed to Apollo Coryceus or Pythian\(^1\); at Dodona vases dedicated to Zeus Naïos\(^2\). Vases inscribed to Athena were found in the temple of Athena Cranaia at Elatea\(^3\). A fragment dedicated to Asclepius was found in the shrine of the hero Amynus at Athens\(^4\).

Stone vessels, perhaps for holy water, were dedicated in Athens\(^5\). A kind of stone laver was dedicated at Epidaurus, meant no doubt, like the draught tables, for use in the precinct\(^6\). At Naucratis, numbers of pottery fragments were found, with dedications to Apollo and Aphrodite scratched on them\(^7\): others were dedicated to Hera and the Dioscuri\(^8\), to Heracles\(^9\), and to the “gods of Greece”\(^10\). Among the dedicators is one historical name, if the Phanes who presented a magnificent bowl\(^11\) be the same who deserted Amasis for Cambyses\(^12\). Perhaps the sculptor Rhoeucus is another\(^13\), and the courtezan Archedice\(^14\).

The vessels are cups and bowls, plates, ewers and craters, in great variety\(^15\). A vase dedicated to Hermes comes from \(^{15}\) These inscr. are often scratcht anyhow over the design, and the editor explains them as discarded fragments thus markt to keep from profane use after they were cast into the temple limbo. It is unsafe, however, to argue from the carelessness of the inscriptions, for in votive inscriptions all variety of carelessness is found. Moreover, the variety and beauty of the Clazomenae; vases probably dedicated to Zeus have been found at Megara, to Apollo at Cynuria, and Epidaurus Limora, to the Paphian in Cyprus. Besides these, there are innumerable fragments of pottery uninscribed, from Argos, Athens, Eleusis, Naucratis, Olympia, and all the chief temple-sites.

At Delphi we find mention of four golden stlengides, which have obvious reference to a sacred pomp, dedicated by the Sybarites; a silver goblet by the Phocians; a gold crown of ivy-leaves by the Peparthians, others of laurel by Ephesus and Lampsacus, which may have had some connexion with the same occasion; we also find mention of many others at Olympia. In the temple of Apollo Ptoan (Boeotia), there are several dedications from delegates of the Boeotian confederacy, and several from separate cities, such as Thespiae and Acraephiae. A bronze vase found at Olympia was dedicated by the people of two cities of Elis, and one by the Spartiates. So too the initiated mystae made dedications in Samothrace and elsewhere. Such an offering is attested by inscriptions found in Thessaly and at Magnesia on the Maeander.

fragments indicate that they were offered by votaries, not used and then discarded. Nor are there such inscriptions on the rude cups characteristic of Hera (ii. 61), nor is the supposed custom found elsewhere.

from Eudocia's notes that mystae used to dedicate their dress at Eleusis. At Megara was a yearly sacrifice to Apollo Protector, and the magistrates on this occasion used to make a dedication of some sort.

Even a joyous celebration of any kind might suggest an offering. The state gave the men of Phyle a thousand drachmas for a sacrifice and votive offerings. When Demetrius Poliorcetes came to Athens, he was received in triumphal procession, and a decree was past to give a prize in money to him who made the most sumptuous show, which money he was to expend on a votive offering.

Again: colonists sent offerings to the great feasts of the mother city. We know that the Athenian colonies sent an ox each to the Panathenaea; and two dedications of colonies made in Athens are extant. In Sparta was a statue of Athena dedicated by the Tarentine colonists.

Private persons of course also made dedications on consulting an oracle. There is a fine relief from the Pythium at Athens, representing the god seated upon the tripod, and two other figures, female, of divine size, one with her hand upon the god's shoulder. This may be a thank-offering for some oracular response. In later times the offering seems commonly to have taken the form of a small altar. One such comes from Troezen, and is inscribed with the question put to the oracle and the answer. This was the custom at the oracle of Libyan Ammon, and Pausanias saw there altars with the questions of Eleans and the answers given them. The first celebration of the taurobolium at Athens was commemorated by an altar, and the same offering was repeated at a later date\(^1\). A series of altars, all late, were found in the port of Delos\(^2\), which may be assigned to pilgrims; they record the dedication of other things, such as a shrine\(^3\), a circuit-wall\(^4\), statues of Athena\(^5\), Heracles\(^6\), Maia\(^7\), and other gods. Memorials of a periodical sacrifice to some deity unknown are cut in the rock at Lindos, with the names of those who performed it\(^8\). In Egypt records have been found of the pilgrimage of devotees to the shrine of Isis, all of late date\(^9\). The answer of a god might be dedicated alone\(^10\).

A large number of dedications have reference to the sacrifice itself. We may classify them thus:

(1) Figures or groups which represent the devotee prepared for sacrifice, or engaged in some ritual act.
(2) Models of the thing sacrificed.
(3) The articles used in the ritual.
(4) The deity to whom sacrifice is made.

(1) \textit{Figures or groups which represent the devotee.}

The figures found in the temple precincts are difficult of interpretation. The question is, whom do they represent; the deity, the priestly person, the devotee, or (it is even asked) the devotee in the garb and aspect of the deity? The last suggestion may be dismissed. Whatever be the origin of sacrifice, whatever the practices of savages, I know of no evidence to show that the Greek devotee in sacrificing regarded himself as one with the god. Indeed, Pausanias speaks of a figure of Alexander in the garb of Zeus, with a tone which suggests that it was an impious thing\(^11\). If one priest on a great day wears the mask of Demeter\(^12\), if a priestess of Artemis rides in a car drawn by deer\(^1\), these need prove no more than that a mystery-play was being acted; and even so, they are exceptions. This mystical notion was, if I read aright, foreign to the sanity of the Greek intellect, and their idea of the sacrifice was much more simple. As regards the other interpretations, some figures are quite clearly meant for the deity, others, as male figures offered to a female deity\(^2\), quite clearly are not; very many are doubtful. Again: of those which are not divine, some may be priestly persons, some cannot. The last class cannot be all ornaments, because many of them are not ornamental; even supposing toys to have been used and dedicated at an early date, they cannot all be toys, because some have direct reference to cult (as the ring-dancers), some have the attitude of worship, some represent the phases of human life at which votive offerings were customary. We have already seen how war\(^3\) and athletic prowess\(^4\), the earning of daily bread\(^5\) and the birth of children\(^6\), are indicated in this way. It follows, then, that the devotee was sometimes represented by votive figures. But, as I have before pointed out, it is the devotee doing something or other. Portraits are out of the question, so is all idea of substitution by similitude. The figures represent the act or process, the human activity which has been blest by the god, or which the man desires to keep in remembrance. The sacrificial group of Oenoe is the most complete example of the attempt to perpetuate the memory of a sacrifice\(^7\).

Here we have specially to consider those human figures which suggest the rites of sacrifice; and I shall first name the most significant examples, passing on to interpret others in the light of these.

First, the archaic statue of Rhombus or Combus found on the Acropolis of Athens, bearing a calf on his shoulders\(^8\). He is clad in a shepherd’s cloke of thick frieze or hide, which hangs down before and behind him. I am aware that this is the attitude of Hermes Criophorus\(^1\), but here we are in Athena's shrine; moreover, the attitude is exactly that of the modern Greek peasant, who may be seen any Good Friday in the streets of Athens, thus bearing the lamb which he is to slay for his Easter Feast. I take Rhombus, then, to have set up this memorial of the sacrifice which he did, perhaps for some unexampled prosperity or the present help of the goddess. A bronze statuette from Crete\(^2\), like Rhombus bearing an animal, clad in the ancient loincloth of the Mycenaeans\(^3\), and standing upon a base, was no doubt dedicated for the like reason. A ram-bearer of the same type comes from the Theban Cabirium\(^4\), and one was found at Gela\(^5\). Pausanias saw in the temple of Apollo Lycaeus at Argos the statue of a man Bitou with a bull on his shoulders: a story was told to explain it, of course; but we may place him by the side of Rhombus\(^6\). In the Cabirium too\(^4\) were several figures holding a lamb under the arm, which we may now interpret in the same way. Others carry a cock or some other bird\(^4\). In the temple of Apollo at Naucratis there are two figures of a man leading a bull\(^7\). A bronze ox being led to sacrifice stood in the Eleusinium at Athens\(^8\). Very ancient figures, from Praesus in Crete, hold some offering in the hand\(^9\). Finally, some figures of Artemis found in Corcyra show a human figure dancing before her, or clasping her knees\(^10\).

\(^3\) The loin-cloth also on archaic statuettes from Olympia (Bronzen, pl. xvi.), statuettes and the great Naxian Apollo of Delos (AZ xl. 329), perhaps Delphi (BCH xxi. pl. x.), statuettes in the Dictaean cave (Ann. Br. Sch. Ath. vi. 107).

We have now a criterion to determine the interpretation of the numerous figures which bear a calf, pig, cock, dove, or other bird, fruit or flowers, and other things which could actually be offered. Other figures, again, have reference to the ritual. Unmistakable are the ring-dances of women, a whole series of which were found at Olympia\(^1\) and in Cyprus; and by their help we shall explain figures which play upon the pipes or the harp, or which carry a musical instrument, a bowl and jug or a lustral spray, or a jar of water upon the head, which clap the hands, or imitate any act of the possible ceremony. Further: figures are found which hold up the hand in the attitude of worship, as at Cyprus and Tegea. It will now be useful to consider the centres one by one, in order to give some idea of the variety to be found in each.

Beginning with the Mycenaean age, a few figures are known which play upon the harp or the pipes\(^2\). In the Argive Heraeum, probably the most ancient shrine in Greece, we find both male and female figures, but few human figures which have reference to ritual. There are however a few women who appear to be carrying something; and male figures are found, which cannot represent the goddess. At Olympia the ring-dancers, and a number of figures of both sexes, one a female holding a dove\(^3\), but nothing else characteristic of cult\(^4\). At Dodona we have bronze ritual figures which may be meant for the priest, holding in his hand objects used in the cult; the priestess, holding a dove, vase and saucer, or some similar object; and a sacrificer, with a knife; also a flute-girl with double flute, of the sixth century. At Amyclae was found a bronze male figure in ceremonial head-dress, which once held something in the hand. On the Acropolis of Athens are a male and a female figure of bronze which appear to be dancing; and a naked man holding up a wreath as if offering it. Large numbers of clay figures here found are unarmed, and hold a bird, an apple or a pomegranate. Stone figures of boys holding a dove or some such object, and of a girl with a holy-water basin, are also known at Athens. From Eleusis comes the figure of a boy carrying a bundle of sticks, which are familiar in the cult. The Cabirium yielded some hundreds of male figures, both clothed and naked, carrying a lamb, or holding a cock to the bosom, and in the other hand a jug or bowl, or holding hare and bowl, lyre and bowl, or a bird, or with jug and bowl together. At Tegea were some hundreds of girls bearing water-pitchers, female figures standing with a pig or a wreath in the hand, and a few dancers. Figures of girls carrying pigs were found at Paestum and several places in Sicily, Acragas, Camarina, and Gela; girls with pig and torch at Camarina, girls with dove or wreath at Megara. A shrine near Catania contained many archaic figures of girls holding a pig, a flower or fruit, 'basket of eatables', torch or sceptre; but some are probably divine. Naucratis gives us stone figures of the sixth century holding the libation bowl, and females in terra-cotta playing upon the pipes or the lyre; from the temple of Aphrodite came male figures draped and nude, flotist and harpist. The female figures holding bird, goat, or flower to the breast, are perhaps the goddess. The girl flotists in the hero-shrine at Therapne have been mentioned already. There were silver and gold statuettes in Delos, and one held two Attic drachmae in the hand: a new motive. The scheme of the Hero Feast is represented in ninety-nine per cent. of terra-cotta examples from Tarentum. In the Dictaean cave of Crete were figures both male and female, the hand being frequently raised to the head as in adoration\(^1\). Similar is a statuette from Athens, of a female deity holding a torch or staff, whose hand rests on the head of a small figure of a man by her side\(^2\). Abundant evidence for this practice comes from Cyprus. At Voni, in the sanctuary of Apollo, were found a host of figures, draped, and all male except two, ranging from the archaic to late periods. Some are playing on the double flute\(^3\), some hold a dove and pyxis\(^4\), or a pyxis and a branch\(^5\), others have no attributes at all\(^6\). They are bearded\(^7\) or beardless\(^8\), and some of later date appear to be meant for portraits\(^9\); one is inscribed\(^10\). There is great variety of type. The two female figures\(^11\) are explained by the compilers of the catalogue as “inappropriate offerings brought from home,” a somewhat lame explanation. At Chytri, a sanctuary of the Paphian goddess, there are “crouching boys,” holding a bird or a patera, perhaps the temple attendants\(^12\); female devotees, erect, with hands raised to the head, or by the sides, or touching the breasts\(^13\), holding a pyxis\(^14\), drum or tambourine\(^15\), or a flower\(^16\), playing on the flute\(^17\) or dancing in a ring\(^18\). At Soli both male and female figures are found\(^19\), with a number of ring-dances\(^20\). At Citium, in the sanctuary probably of Artemis, most of the figures are female, but male are found. Commonest is the votary, male or female, playing upon the tambourine\(^21\); two or three play upon the harp\(^22\). Others bring a flower or wreath\(^23\), dish of cakes\(^24\) or bowl of wine\(^25\), bird\(^26\), or calf\(^27\);

a few, all female, have a lamp on their heads¹. These objects are of importance, because some of them have the hands in a posture of supplication, and are therefore unmistakable as devotees². In the sanctuary of Aphrodite at Idalium, all the statuettes are female. Many have no attributes, but there are others bearing flowers³, cakes⁴, or birds⁵, clapping the hands⁶, playing upon lyre⁷ or tambourine⁸, or with arms raised or extended⁹. A series of large terra-cotta figures come from Salamis, which from their look and costume seem certainly meant for human votaries¹⁰. The female type holding fruit, flowers, or animals¹¹, tambourine or bowl¹², is represented, and male figures also hold flowers¹³ or kids¹⁴. From Tamassos come a number of statuettes, all male, apparently of the votary¹⁵, sometimes offering a plate of fruit¹⁶, or holding a bird, pyxis, or lustral spray¹⁷. At a sanctuary in Asia Minor, probably that of Artemis Anaitis, were found a number of objects which show an economical way of representing this idea: they consist of the hand as far as the elbow, holding fruit, birds, or some other offering¹⁸. In view of this evidence, we must conclude that the statuettes were not all meant for the deity; that some at least were meant for human beings; and that probably there were worshippers as well as priests among them. But once more, these are not portraits: they represent an act.

It will be convenient here to enumerate such votive reliefs as we have not been able to find a place for. We have seen that these reliefs (with one possible exception)¹⁹ never represent a myth or legend as such, but are divisible into those which exhibit (1) the power of the deity, (2) the act or process which he has made to prosper, or (3) the ritual. It is likely that most votive reliefs commemorated not an ordinary but an extraordinary moment, some signal favour of the god for which his worshipper has done sacrifice; but generally we cannot divine the occasion. The indeterminate pieces cannot, however, fairly be left unnoticed; and provisionally they may be placed here. I shall include any which do not violate the principles shown in the others; feeling quite certain that the presence of worshippers or a sacrificial scene is conclusive for their interpretation as votive.

An unmistakable votive tablet, found lately in Euboea, shows Artemis, Apollo, and Leto in the presence of a worshipper: Apollo is playing upon the harp, Leto apparently holds a sceptre (painted), and Artemis holds torches¹. Sacrifices to the three deities together were made at Delphi². One with a similar scheme, on which however Artemis takes an arrow from a quiver, and a gazelle stands by her side, and which lacks the worshipper, is in the Athenian Museum³; and a third is inscribed with a dedication⁴. These are strong evidence that the series of Harpist reliefs is votive; but prove nothing for the occasion, which may be other than a musical victory. A fragment, inscribed as a dedication of two men, from the late fifth century, shows Apollo seated upon a rock⁵. The society of Pythaists, singly or in groups, made similar dedications to Apollo. The god sits on the omphalos, a bowl in his right hand, a lustral spray in his left; beside him Artemis, with quiver; a worshipper uplifting his hand completes the scene⁶. Another shows Apollo playing upon the lyre, Artemis, and Leto, with a male worshipper⁷. Other thiasi or similar societies thus commemorated their festival times. Thus Xenodotus dedicates a feast-relief to Apollo\(^1\); and Golgos yields a relief of Apollo enthroned, with a procession of worshippers; the lower division of the slab shows a feast and a ritual dance\(^2\). Apollo is also associated with Athena\(^3\), and in a piece from Cyzicus, with Dionysus and Zeus\(^4\). The beautiful terra-cotta relief of Aphrodite from South Italy is probably meant to suggest the goddess’s divine power. She stands before Hermes, holding out to him in one hand a pomegranate, in the other a winged love\(^5\). Another, of the type called Aphrodite and Ares, shows a goddess pouring a libation into a bowl held by an armed warrior over an altar; a worshipper in the corner proves the votive character\(^6\). Arctinus and Menecratia dedicate a relief to her as Leader of the People\(^7\). Athena also appears on reliefs which tell no plain tale, other than by their altar or sacrificial scene or inscription that they are votive\(^8\). The Acropolis relief of Athena offering a hand to a seated man has been spoken of already\(^9\). Again, an archaic female figure offers a cake or garland with one hand, and holds some vessel in the other\(^10\). A man and a small boy appear as worshippers in another case, but all that remains of the goddess is her hand with an owl perched on it\(^11\). The goddess sometimes brandishes her spear\(^12\), sometimes sits with her helmet upon her lap\(^13\), or by her side\(^14\), or stands in a quiet attitude\(^15\). Once she appears robed like the archaic Maiden statues of the Acropolis, but with a helmet, in company with two other female figures of divine size before a group of three worshippers who are leading a sow\(^16\). There is also the much discussed relief-niche in which are two armed Athenas side by side\(^1\). She is joined also with Cybele and a bearded male figure in a mantle who holds a club, probably from Asia Minor\(^2\).

Characteristic offerings to Cybele were the votive niches or small shrines, none of them early, in which she is seated upon a throne with various accessories. She sits in the shrine alone, holding a bowl and tympanum\(^3\); or she has attendants, a youthful male with sacrificial vessels, and a bearded deity, perhaps Hermes and Priapus\(^4\). On the pilasters of the shrine are often engraved the figures of worshippers\(^5\), who also appear within\(^6\); even Pan appears on the pillar\(^7\). A lion is at her feet\(^8\), or two lions\(^9\), or she is even seated upon a lion.

An altar sometimes appears, or a scene of sacrifice\(^10\). These little shrines come from Peiraeus\(^11\), Ephesus\(^12\), Minutoli\(^13\), Sardis\(^14\), Perinthus\(^15\), and Samos\(^16\), and go back to the fourth century. One fine specimen of terra-cotta was found in a tomb\(^17\). They are sometimes inscribed\(^18\). A double Cybele has also been found in several examples\(^1\), like the double images of Athena and Pan. There is also a fine relief of the early fourth century, where Cybele sits sideways, holding bowl and tympanum, a lion at her foot, and facing her is a female figure bearing a torch. Here also ‘Hermes’ appears\(^2\). Another relief is in Venice, and shows Cybele with attributes, Attis, a woman worshipper and a female attendant\(^3\). A relief bust from Mysia is inscribed\(^4\).

Dedications to Demeter and the Maid, which represent scenes from the Mysteries, belong to this place. One such appears to be the famous relief from Eleusis, representing the goddesses with Triptolemus standing between\(^5\). Another represents Triptolemus on a throne before the goddesses\(^6\), or on a waggon with snakes attendant\(^7\). Demeter sits on a throne, holding sceptre and ears of corn, while the Maid with her torches draws nigh; or the Maid stands behind Triptolemus, who sits on a winged throne, whilst a train of worshippers approaches\(^8\). Others similar exist, one inscribed\(^9\). On a slab in the Eleusis Museum the Maid holding torches approaches Demeter enthroned; and others show Triptolemus seated in a throne with snake and wing, the Maid holding torches on his left, and Demeter on the right, with four worshippers. Other reliefs, which show two female divinities, one with a torch, the other resembling the typical Demeter, are assigned to this pair; the presence of worshippers will attest the votive character\(^10\). A late relief from Sparta represents standing in the centre Demeter and the Maid, holding torches; one is seated, and Cerberus beneath the throne; to their right, a man with a long staff, and to their left a girl holding a bundle and some fruit; over the girl’s head is a winged figure with wreath.

It is inscribed as a thank-offering; the meaning is not clear, but a ritual act most likely. It may be worth while to mention a beautiful vase found in Eleusis, depicting the Rape of Persephone, and with a dedicatory inscription scratched upon it.

Dionysus also appears in groups which do not suggest a musical or dramatic victory. Thus in a Theban relief he sits on a rock, thyrsus in hand, and before him stands a female deity. He appears on his throne, a snake beside him; or as Sabazios he is seated in a biga, having snake and eagle; or he is in company with a goddess clad in the fawnskin.

Many offerings are made to Hecate; and the variety of her functions, as a chthonian deity and therefore connected with the worship of the dead, as well as likely to be appealed to for help, or as connected with marriage and birth, or in other capacities, makes it impossible to guess at the occasion. None of the reliefs are archaic. She appears triform in a votive niche, holding torches and the vessel of libation; or in the hideous oriental shape. Hestia is also thus commemorated on a Thessalian stone. There are one or two dedications to Zeus Philios, whose occasion can only be guessed; and another relief to Zeus, with worshipper, is a thank-offering.

sacrificial group, and we are prepared to find them dedicated alone. This is in fact the simplest permanent memorial of a sacrifice, if the offerer wishes to commemorate it at all. It is well known that the Greeks often dedicated cakes in the form of animals: at the Diasia, for instance, an ancient agricultural feast, held in honour of Zeus Meilichios, cakes were offered in this shape by tradition. The lexicographers mention a cake in ox-shape, which was offered no doubt by the poor; and a peasant in the Anthology offers cakes in the shape of oxen to Deo. The cake itself was even modelled in marble, and the clay model of a tray of edibles was found in the Argive Heraeum. The relief of Philombrotus’s hair is another example of the same principle.

But we are not left to inference from analogy in the interpretation of animal models. By a great stroke of luck, the Acropolis of Athens has furnisht a beautiful sheep, bearing the legend in very ancient letters, “The supplication of Peisis.” The proverbial Mandrobulus, too, having found a treasure in Samos, offered to Hera a golden sheep the first year, one of silver the second, and one of bronze the third. This may be the true explanation of the bronze oxen sent to Olympia by the Corcyraeans and the Eretrians, the bronze oxen at Delphi given by the Plataeans and the Carystians, the bronze bull dedicated by the Areopagus, and a bronze ox by the courtezan Cottina in Sparta. Another explanation has been suggested of the bulls and rams which have been found: but it is clearly possible they may be sacrifices like that of Peisistratus. It will be well, then, briefly to enumerate here as well those animals which are inscribed as those which are not.

But first we must form some idea, what animals could be sacrificed. It is true, certain deities preferred certain animals, as Demeter and Persephone the swine, or refused them altogether, as this creature was refused by Aphrodite. Local and special rules, again, prescribed certain victims, for certain places and times. But sheep and oxen were always welcome, and wild animals were never part of the ordinary sacrifice. It is probable, however, that there was more licence than we now imagine. Thus there was no necessity in most cases for the sex of the victim to be that of the deity. And further, the poor could probably sacrifice much as they would. The cock must have been a common offering, to judge from the way Aristotle speaks of it, and we are given to understand that they were not necessarily slain but simply presented. I take this to have been the poor man's offering to other gods than Asclepius. I shall venture, then, to cite the models of cocks in this section, not forgetting that they may sometimes be fighting cocks offered for other reasons. So also, the doves and other birds held in the hands of votive figures are fairly to be taken as meant for offerings given or accepted; and if so, models of these creatures may be interpreted in the same way. The dove is certainly not a necessary attribute of Aphrodite, as we have seen. To Artemis Laphria at Patrae were offered "edible kinds of birds and victims of every sort," and it would be rash to assert that she was alone. To the Mistress in Lykosura, every one sacrificed what he had; at Aulis all victims were lawful. In Messene, says Pausanias, at a "hall of the Curetes, they sacrifice all victims alike; they begin with oxen and goats, and end with birds, throwing them all into the flames." A sacrificial calendar from Marathon, which gives details of many sacrifices, does not observe any rule as to the sex of the victims being the same as that of the deity. Ram, goat, sheep, kine, and pig are mentioned; and the sacrifice made to Athena is an ox, three sheep and a pig. In the shrine at Patrae wild boars, deer, and roe were offered, even the cubs of wolves and bears, or the full-grown beasts. I regard these as originally the firstlings of the hunter, and have already cited other examples under the same head; they will therefore not come in here. Nor will the models of horses, which were only sacrificed on the rarest occasions, and which are more naturally regarded as firstlings; nor the figures of dogs, although the sacrifice of these creatures is not unknown. The general principle seems to have been that the victims should be edible food for men; and Suidas mentions as the regular ones sheep, kine, swine, goats, fowls, and geese.

We may now take a general review of the animal models: not to imply that they must commemorate a sacrifice, but that they may. The Argive Heraeum yielded hundreds of animals in bronze and clay: bulls, cows, oxen and ox-heads, goats, had fewer legs it might be a tortoise. At Dodona were fewer: but the bull, ram and dove appear. In the Cabirium is a total of more than 500 animals in bronze and lead, the greatest number being bulls or oxen; more than twenty-five bulls are inscribed. They include a few goats and rams; and in clay were hundreds of bulls or oxen, sheep, and pigs. All whose sex can be made out are male, but many are indeterminate. Numbers of bulls and horses were found in the sanctuary of Poseidon at Taenarum. Models of animals were found on the Acropolis of Athens: besides the sheep of Peisis, and the stone ram, there are the bull and the ox, the sheep or ram, and cocks. Other birds there were, which were probably parts of vases or held in the hand of some figure, as indeed the cocks may have been. The bull and bullock were found at Eleusis in bronze, with fragments of earthen rams and oxen. A bronze ram from Prasie is inscribed to Apollo Maleatas. Fragments of rams came to light at Amyclae. At Lusi animals were found, but mostly wild ones; there were doves, however, among them. From Crete we have a bull and fragments of animals in the Idaean cave; oxen, goats, rams, kine, of bronze and terra-cotta, in the cave of Hermes; bulls, with rams and many other animals, in the Dictaean cave. In a shrine near the Boeotian Orchomenus were found numbers of beasts, with an ox-head and a rabbit. In Therapne were found some of the bases which support models of animals. A marble ram was dedicated at Cnidus to the Maid. Archaic Greek models of votive oxen were found in Apulia, and in Tarentum (where was a shrine of Persephone) a whole series of pigs. Some of the golden or silver animals mentioned in the lists may have been dedicated on the principle here discussed. There were fifty or sixty golden ox-heads, modelled with an axe between the horns, found in one of the tombs at Mycenae; perhaps representing sacrifice to the dead. The same may be true of the magnificent ox-head in gold and silver. It is recorded that a priest spent the price of a ram on a votive offering.

From the long series of vases found in the tomb at Menidhi, it would appear that the vessel used to hold the food or what not which was brought to the sacred place was left with it and formed part of the offering. This will explain the hosts of rude vases, usually all of a shape, found at sacred places. Examples are: the Argive Heraeum, the Dictaean cave, Naucratis, at Olympia seemingly, and at Eleusis, in which last place the visitor may still grub up tiny pots from the loose earth. To dedicate these was probably a common custom.

Lamps appear also to have been offered, and a number were found in Athens, Bathos, and the Cretan cave. There are some indications, though I cannot call them conclusive, that models of the wreaths which were worn, or some other objects, were possible dedications. A few of these were found in the hero-shrine at Amyclae; and in Olympia, fragments of bronze wreaths or sprays. It is not likely, but not impossible, that models of wreaths might be dedicated, since the figure of a man bearing a wreath has been found. The wreath would bear the same relation to the figure as the separate animal to a figure holding an animal. I can see no other reason for the dedication of models of torches made of the precious metals, recorded in Boeotia, than that they are memorials of some vigil or ceremony where the dedicators had held them.

(4) The deity.

We have seen that one of the most common offerings for occasions of all sorts was the figure of the deity; and we may assume therefore that a pilgrim would as naturally dedicate one when he paid his devoirs at the shrine, as the pious Catholic offers a figure of the Virgin and Child. I propose here to consider those large series of divine figures, which have come to light in many parts of the Greek world, which were offered on occasions unknown by generations of worshippers, and which in default of direct evidence may be supposed to have been given at the recurrent feast or pilgrimage. And first, the facts.

The earliest figures of this class are rude female idols of stone, quite naked, of which examples have been found in Delphi and on the Acropolis of Athens. The former, being made of Parian marble, should have been carried to Delphi by a visitor, perhaps when Delphi was the oracle of her whom Aeschylus calls Themis, or the Earth. Others of this type have been found in the islands, placed in ancient tombs. There are also figures of a female deity with wings, found at Amyclae and Therapne, which may be referred to another ancient goddess, she who is identified by the Greeks with Artemis. A series of goddess-figures with animal heads is said to have been discovered\(^1\). But these are isolated; and the types we have next to consider show a series long and unbroken, reaching back to pre-historic times.

found in pockets, probably round altars which go back beyond the Mycenaean age. They range from the earliest primitive idol, shapeless, without mark of sex, and naked, to the seated and standing figures of the so-called Tirynthine type, to the class called Mycenaean, these more nearly indicating the human head on a rude body, down by regular transition through the Dipylon stage to archaic Greek: and there they stop. A few bronze figures are also found. The immense preponderance of female figures suggests that the goddess is represented by most of them; for men worshiped Hera, and men were not forbidden her temple; moreover, after reading the earlier chapters of this book, the reader will I think not be inclined to admit special deities for males and females in the ancient days\(^3\).
It will be noted that the goddess is not characterised by cuckoo, peacock, or other distinctive attributes.

The earthen fragments found on the Acropolis at Athens number about five thousand. They include two shapeless idols in a standing posture, and some three hundred seated idols of the same class, which appear to belong to the Mycenaean age; about a thousand standing and seated female figures of a more advanced style, clothed, and not unlike the ‘Maiden’ statues, but for a headdress which they wear. The standing figures are for the most part without attribute; but some have the shield and gorgon’s mask\(^4\), or a plume on the head, and hold a fruit or bird to the breast with the right hand; others have the right arm raised as if in battle, although no trace of a spear was found. The seated figures sit on a throne wide or narrow\(^5\), wearing stephane or polos, a hand sometimes holding fruit. A number of pieces are the head only, in high relief and hollow, or upon a flat slab, with holes for hanging. As these are all female, and not distinctly marked as the devotee, they should be meant for the goddess herself. In the same place statues of Artemis were found, but less numerous. She also appears both seated upon a throne and standing erect. The seated figures hold a fawn with one hand or the other; those standing hold a fawn in the right hand, a flower or leaf in the left. At Eleusis is a whole series of seated goddesses of the familiar type, not distinguishable from those found elsewhere. In a sacred precinct at Tegea, much the same features re-appear. There are figures both seated and standing, fifteen hundred in number, all female with perhaps one exception; which makes it likely that the figures are meant for the deity, were it Athena, Demeter, or who not. This must be true of the most part, but some which hold pigs in their arms, or carry jars of water, or dance, may perhaps be human beings who took part in the sacrifice. The enthroned figures generally hold a bird, or a flower, close to the breast; grapes lie sometimes upon the lap. In a sanctuary of Artemis in Corcyra were some thousands of draped female figures, mostly archaic, which hold a garland or flower, a bird, fruit, or some such offering, or nothing at all. The interpretation of these is as before doubtful; but there are others which represent the goddess herself, in her character of goddess of the wild woodland. She holds a deer with one hand to her breast; or animals fawn upon her, which she caresses, hare, deer, boar, panther, or lion; again she holds her bow, and in the other hand a bird, deer, or lion, dangling by one leg; sometimes she stands in a chariot behind a pair of deer. Most characteristic of this shrine are others which show a small human figure in front of the goddess, apparently in the act either of dancing past or of clasping her knees. Thus the goddess is clearly intended by independent figures similarly attired. Figures of a similar type, the goddess with her hand on the head of a lion or stag, or with a dog or some animal fawning upon her, come from a grotto near Syracuse. Characterised figures of Artemis come from Locri. Figures of the goddess have also been found in the precinct of Athena Cranaea; and amongst the hundreds labelled "nondescript" we may see the goddess herself without attribute. So in the shrine of Aphroditē at Naukratis, figures were found which are believed to represent the goddess; for one female figure dedicated by a man Polyhermus, cannot be meant for the dedicator. Figures of Apollo occur at his shrine in Voni (Cyprus), with eagle, fawn, or Victory as attributes, and with the "temple boy" or votary. A rough female head, from Thessaly, is dedicated to the Earth by a man.

In the western colonies similar series have been found. Thus at a shrine near Catania, we see the matronly type and the maiden type, both standing, the latter holding pig, fruit, flower, or torch; and seated female figures of wooden modelling. At Megara Hyblaea are the upright draped figure, xoanon type, the seated Demeter type, having the kalathos headgear, and

or other object in it. Masks are also found in some places.

The female standing type called Maiden is also known in two series of large marble statues at Athens and at Delos, and in scattered analogues elsewhere. One holding a dove comes from Marseilles; one from Eleusis, two from the neighbourhood of Apollo Ptoan; one from Samos is dedicated to Hera and differs somewhat from the rest in appearance. A certain variety in the costume is to be seen at Athens, but, magnificent as it is, the costume is human, no doubt the Athenian lady's gala-dress of the sixth century. As a rule they carry nothing in the hand, but one holds a strigil and a flask. The human air of these figures is most markt, and has suggested that they may be meant for priestesses or arrhephori.
I have already given strong reasons for thinking that some must, and all may have been meant for the goddess; and pointed out, that as there is no evidence for the honorific dedication of priestesses thus early, so the statue of an official, if it was dedicated, must be more than a mere human figure, and must in some way represent the function fulfilled. The question becomes clearer still when viewed in the light of these large series of divine figures. It was clearly needless to characterise a deity always in the same way; whilst various deities are drest alike, stand in the same pose, and are indistinguishable from each other and from human beings.
A seated statuette, which otherwise might be taken for Demeter, is inscribed as Hecate. A statue from Samos, inscribed to Hera, much resembles the archaic Delian series. When the conception of a deity becomes clearer, the attributes emerge; and Athena protectress assumes now helmet, now shield, now spear, or all together. This brings us to the definite type of armed Athena, in act to strike with the spear, which is represented by a number of bronzes found on the Acropolis.

The question of the male figures, found in the shrines of male deities, is similar, but it is complicated by the fact that such figures may be meant for athletes. There is a series of archaic stone figures from the sanctuary of Apollo Ptoan, quite naked and without attributes of any kind, some inscribed. One found in Samos, and an archaic bronze figure of a similar type, probably from Thebes, are both inscribed like these to Apollo.

Single examples of a similar type are known from Orchomenus, Thera and Sparta, in the same attitude but of style more advanced from Tenea and Naxos, from Melos, Paros, Phigalea, Actium and many other places. It will be noticed that all those inscribed are dedicated to Apollo. Now an athlete statue must be either honorific, or by the principles we have everywhere seen, it must represent somehow the act recorded. But honorific statues were known before the fourth century in no divine precinct except at Olympia, and perhaps the other places.

centres of the great games; therefore they can hardly be seriously considered for the Ptoan precinct. As the statues are naked, most of the contests are excluded also. A runner ran naked, and so far the statue might be an athlete; but as we saw in the hoplite-runner of Tübingen, he could assume a characteristic attitude. If therefore these were athletes, duly dedicated to Apollo, they should show it in their attitude. It must be admitted, however, that the statues might possibly be meant to represent the γυμνικὸς ἄγων; so that this argument by itself is not conclusive. Further: athletic dedications always record the occasion; these use mostly a bare formula, but the only one which says anything of the occasion calls the statue a tithe. It follows that one of the Ptoan statues was not an athlete, that none of them need have been an athlete, and that such evidence as is to be had goes to show that they were not. We may therefore assume that they were meant for Apollo; and his naked figure stands in the same relation to that armed with the bow, as the Athenian Maiden to the Promachos. How far the same explanation is true of the so-called Apollos depends on the place they stood in; and as this is generally unknown, I leave them alone. But the Samian and Theban figures go with the Ptoan. Figures of Apollo have been found at Delphi and Amyclae; and we are told that an Apollo was the oldest of all the dedications at the Delphic shrine.

The question of Zeus is easier. Most of his figures (there are not many) found at Olympia and Dodona are characterised by holding the thunderbolt, or seem to have held it. Two have the bolt and what is called an eagle. So also at Dodona. But the bearded male figure in a mantle, which once held

2 The male figures on the Acropolis of Athens (Cat. 734, 736, 737, 740) all appear to have held something in the hand. These were certainly not Apollos; but no doubt athletes. A figure called Apollo at Delphi, BCH xxi. pl. x., xi., is naked but for a metal girdle.

Although the greatest part of recorded offerings were promised or given, from thankfulness for favours bestowed or intelligently anticipated, there were others due to fear. It is possible, as I have already suggested, that fear may have entered into the offering of firstfruits; but the feeling is clearer where a votary has to propitiate some offended deity. The feeling is illustrated by the words of Telemachus to Odysseus, whom he takes for a strange god of unknown tastes: "Be gracious, that we may give thee sacrifices to please thee, aye and gifts of wrought gold." Sin-offering and thank-offering are mentioned as natural complements in a story of Orestes. Such offerings, it is true, lack the freewill which is the essence of the rest, but it would be amiss to pass them by without notice.

The most of this class were dedicated to atone for a definite breach of rule or of duty. So, in Homeric days, Artemis must be appeased by the sacrifice of Iphigenia, and sacrifice has to be rendered for the violation of the priest; Aegisthus propitiates heaven with gifts of garments and gold; and it is likely that sacrifice was often done on similar occasions. The crew of Odysseus, about to steal the oxen of the sun, vow to build a temple to the sun, and fill it with fine offerings. So Croesus, who had offended the oracles of Greece by doubting their power, which he put to the test by asking them a ridiculous riddle, tried to appease the two which were found true, by offering magnificent gifts. At Delphi, after first sacrificing, he presented the shrine with a large number of golden ingots of two standard sizes, which were piled in a heap to be the base of a great golden lion; a gold and a silver crater, four pitchers of silver, a gold and a silver holy-water basin, and other objects. To Amphiarao he sent a gold shield and a golden spear. Xerxes too, after flogging the Hellespont, propitiated the powers of the sea by sacrifices done on the bridge, and by casting into the waters the golden bowl which he had used in libation, with a golden crater, and a Persian sword. When the Lacedaemonians had so treacherously murdered the Plataean prisoners, and razed their city to the ground, they built a new temple for Hera and used the bronze and iron found within the place to make fittings for it.

At Olympia, he who broke the rules of the games had to pay a fine, which was used to purchase a bronze statue of Zeus; these Zanes, as they were called, stood in a row near the Treasuries. The first offence recorded is that of Eupolus of Thessaly\(^1\) (98th Ol.) who bribed his competitors in the boxing. The whole six of them were fined, and appropriate inscriptions were placed upon the statues, as thus: “the victory is won by strength and swiftness, not by money”: “the statue stands for honour to God, for the piety of the Eleans, and for a terror to evildoers.” In Ol. 110 Callippus of Athens bribed his rivals in the pentathlon\(^2\). The Athenians took the matter up, and sent the orator Hyperides to plead for him; but he lost the case. Still, the Athenians refused to pay, and consequently all of that city were excluded from the games until by oracle from Delphi they were persuaded to pay the fine. A curious case was that of the Alexandrian boxer, Apollonius\(^3\). He arrived late, and pleaded baffling winds; but the fact was he had been prize-hunting all over the Aegean, and this made him to be late. When the judges refused to admit him to compete, and the victor had the wreath awarded to him without a contest, in fury Apollonius rushed at him; and for this contempt of court he was fined. In Ol. 192 even an Elean dared to cheat. The competitors, Polycrator and Sosandrus, were on this occasion held guiltless, or at least one of them\(^4\). The two fathers were punished in the usual way. In Ol. 201 Serapion of Alexandria, who had entered for the pancratium, played the coward and departed before the event, and for his cowardice was fined\(^5\). Fines were customary at Olympia for other breaches of sacrificial rules\(^6\).

When the Athenians fell into arrears with their sacred mission to Dodona, they were enjoined to sacrifice, and to offer a bronze table with some other object not specified\(^7\).

There is an indication that the practice was wider than we know, in a late inscription from Coloë. On a slab of marble, beneath a relief of a mounted hero or god holding a double axe, is a legend which informs us that this was dedicated by Antonia to Apollo, as atonement for having attended a ceremonial dance in a dirty dress\(^1\). The base of a “thank-offering and atonement” was found at Cnidus\(^2\). The Epidaurian pig demanded as a punishment for scepticism, will be remembered\(^3\). Two entries in the catalogue of the Asclepieum suggest fines\(^4\).

In some sanctuaries, where the worshipper's dress was prescribed, jewels and ornaments were not to be worn; any so brought in were forfeit, and consecrated in the shrine and to the deity\(^5\). This was the law in the temple of Despoina at Lycosura, for garments purple or black, or of any bright colour, sandals, rings, and gold ornaments\(^6\). A similar rule held in Andania\(^7\), Ialysus\(^8\), and perhaps elsewhere. We find “false staters,” apparently confiscated from Lacon, in the temple of Brauronian Artemis at Athens\(^9\). So also at Delos\(^10\). Dionysius of Syracuse made all the women dedicate their ornaments, which he then seized; if anyone thereafter wished to wear gold, she had to dedicate a votive offering of some sort\(^11\).

For the crime of bloodguilt, expiation was sometimes made in the same way, as Plutarch implies\(^12\). The Metroum at Athens was founded to propitiate the soul of a murdered man\(^13\). In the story of Cerebus and his slaying of Poene, the oracle of Apollo commanded him to expiate the guilt by founding a temple\(^14\). A statue of Cylon on the Acropolis\(^15\) may perhaps have been dedicated because of the murder of the conspirators in violation of the sanctuary of the

The same principle is seen in two statues of Pausanias, dedicated in the Brazen House at Sparta, from which he had been dragged forth and slain. Perhaps we may conjecture that one was intended to lay the ghost of Pausanias, and the other to lay the ghost of the hapless Cleonice, who was killed by Pausanias in mistake. We are told that Pausanias had tried in vain to set her spirit at rest, what with wizards and what with sacrifices to Zeus, as god of Flight. These dedications were enjoined by the Delphic oracle. When a certain Timagoras, a foreigner, was bidden by his Athenian lover to cast himself down from the Acropolis, he did so; whereupon the lover did the same. For this the foreigners of Athens dedicated an altar to Anteros, or as Suidas says, a statue of the Athenian. A temple of Artemis at Tegea was built to expiate the slaying of the tyrant Aristomelidas by one Chronius, who did it in obedience to a vision of Artemis. The Argives, after an internecine feud, expiated the bloodshed by setting up a statue of Gracious Zeus. We might be tempted to place here the reliefs dedicated to Zeus under this title, but that he was worshiped as Gracious by the farmers. Propitiatory offerings were certainly made to him under this title.

Treaties and laws were sanctioned with fines for the breaking of them: although these are assessed in money, the sums were, sometimes at least, expended in a votive offering, so that they cannot be excluded. Periander decreed that anyone who helped his banished son should pay a fine to Apollo. In the ancient Elean treaties, the violator was to pay a sum of money to Zeus Olympius. Similar rules appear in Athenian documents.

and in the treaty between Orchenenus and the Achaean League. The Amphictyonic Council imposed fines, not only on states (as in the case of Phocis) but on single persons for breach of oath. Other ordinances of Delphi, such as a vote of privilege to a distinguishèd man, were guarded by fines in case of violation. For any offence against a certain decree of Acraephia, two thousand staters were to be paid as sacred to Apollo. Emancipations were sometimes similarly guarded. At Messene, he who infringed the liberty of an enfranchised slave paid ten minae to Limnatis; at Delphi, a silver talent to Apollo; at Elatea, ten minae to Asclepius. So in Coronea, Daulis, Hyampolis, Stiris.

At Athens, officials who broke their oath or neglected their duty were compelled to make an expiatory offering. Under the Solonian constitution the nine archons swore in such case to dedicate a golden statue, which from the words used appears to have been meant for a portrait. Suidas appears to imply that three were to be offered, in Delphi, Olympia, and Athens, one each; and Plato and Plutarch add, that it was to be of equal weight with the offender. The archon who failed in his duty to orphan heiresses, by not compelling the next of kin to wed or to dower them, paid a thousand drachmae to Hera. Archons who failed to punish tradesmen for using false measures, were fined a thousand drachmae sacred to Demeter and the Maid; and those who violated a law concerned with triarchy paid a like sum to Athena, as also did prytanes or presidents who failed in their duty\textsuperscript{1}. The magistrature who had not past his audit was forbidden to make any votive offering at all\textsuperscript{2}; possibly to prevent a sham dedication after the principle of corban. If a member violated a rule of the phratry he paid a hundred drachmae to Zeus Guardian of the Phratry\textsuperscript{3}; a similar penalty fell on the offending priest of a body of thiasotes\textsuperscript{4}. A breach of law at Eleusis involved a fine to Dionysus\textsuperscript{5}. At Chalcedon, any proposal contravening a sacrificial law, made in the assemblies, was atoned for by a fine to Aesclepius\textsuperscript{6}. A similar provision was made at Lampsacus\textsuperscript{7}; and a Carian law was sanctioned under a thousand drachmae paid to Zeus\textsuperscript{8}. A tomb in Asia Minor is guarded against violation under fine to Hephaestus\textsuperscript{9}; a very common thing in the later times. Even in a decree for army transport during the Peloponnesian war, the provision is made that a neglect of contract should involve a fine to Athena\textsuperscript{10}.

The tithe of certain fines was due to the gods. This was done when a man was mulcted for damaging the sacred olives at Athens\textsuperscript{11}, in Rhodes for violating a certain decree\textsuperscript{12}. A portion of confiscated goods was also consecrated. After the fall of Polycrates, his secretary dedicated in the Heraeum the splendid furniture and ornaments of his hall\textsuperscript{13}. At Athens, it was the tithe of the confiscations which the goddess claimed\textsuperscript{14}. Anyone who spoke or acted against the constitution of Brea, a colony founded about 444, must forfeit his goods, of which one tenth went to Athena\textsuperscript{15}. In the treaty between Athens

The fines and votive offerings touch in the Zanes; and they touch also in the case of Themistocles, who, when overseer of the water supply, used the fines of those who had diverted the water to purchase and dedicate a bronze 'maiden,' that is on our supposition a statue of Athena, which the Persians afterwards carried away amongst their booty to Sardis.

Amasis to Polycrates: Herod. iii. 40.

How David poured out before the Lord the water which his chiefs brought him from the well of Bethlehem, is a story familiar to all. The same spirit which moved David is seen amongst the Greeks also: it is in fact what prompted the dedication of the ἀκροθλίνιον. Anything rare or strange would naturally be a fit offering for a god; and the legends of heroic ages gradually became attached to these offerings. Thus the pious Greek could behold at Delphi the very stone which Cronus swallowed in place of Zeus, still ceremonially anointed with oil and held in honour. At Chaeronea he could see that sceptre, made for Zeus by Hephaestus, which had past through the hands of Hermes, Pelops, Atreus, Thyestes, and Agamemnon, and was found buried on the confines of Phocis; to which the Phocians ever after paid supreme honour, doing sacrifice before it, and setting out a sacred table laden with all manner of meats. At Olympia were the bones of Geryones, dedicated by Heracles. The shrine of Asclepius in Megalopolis contained enormous bones, greater than human, which had once been those giants who helped Rhea in her revolt. So in later days, the fisherman dedicated to the sea-gods a huge rib which his net had caught. The flutes of Marsyas were preserved at Corinth, in the shrine of Persuasion, where they had been dedicated by the shepherd who found them. The Golden Fleece found a last resting place in one temple, and in another were the wings of Daedalus. Of the Calydonian boar, both skin and tusks were preserved in the temple of Athena Alea at Tegea; the tusks were three feet round, and no doubt belonged originally to some mammoth. So mammoth ribs found in Warwickshire have been popularly assigned to the terrible Dun Cow slain by Guy of Warwick. Meleager was so considerate as to leave the spear he slew the boar with at Corinth, where it was dedicated rather inappropriately in the shrine of Persuasion. Even the fatal necklet of Eriphyle was dedicated at Delphi by the sons of Phegeus; and an imitation of it is mentioned in the temple catalogues of Delos. It consisted of "light-coloured stones," amber perhaps, strung upon gold. In Gabala, Pausanias saw the robe which was wrapt round the infant Alcmaeon, when he was delivered to Eriphyle. The gold-hafted knife of Oenomaus was in the Treasury at Olympia; there also the sword of Pelops, with a golden hilt, was preserved, and his chariot stood on the roof of the Anactorium at Celeae. At Olympia, under a roof set up to protect it, stood a wooden pillar which once supported the roof of Oenomaus' house, thus inscribed:

στῦλος ἐν Οἴνομάου πρίν πτοτ’ ἐουσα δόμοις

These words suggest that the ancient column, saved thus miraculously from the burning, was consecrated as a thing holy and in a way under the protection of the god. From the Homeric age we have a stone on which Manto, daughter of Teiresias, used to sit, which was preserved at Thebes\(^1\). At Nicomedeia was the knife of Memnon\(^2\). The spear of Achilles found its way to Phaselis\(^3\), and an epigram speaks of the dirk of Helicaon\(^4\). The lance of Caeneus was also to be seen\(^5\); and in the temple of the Mothers at Engyion in Sicily were spears and helmets, used by Meriones and others, and then dedicated by Odysseus\(^6\). Helen's golden stool was to have been given to the wisest man in the world; but as all the wise men of Greece were too modest to take it, a final home for it was found in Delphi or the temple of Apollo Ismenius at Thebes\(^7\).

Hippodameia's couch was to be seen in the Heraeum at Olympia\(^8\), Nestor's cup was dedicated to Artemis in Capua\(^9\), and the cup of Odysseus somehow found its way to south Italy\(^10\); while the Argonauts left a number of cups in a shrine at Samothrace\(^11\). Still more notable, the very goblet which Zeus gave to Alcmena, when he assumed the shape of Amphitryon, was preserved, and doubtless this too was dedicated in a temple\(^12\). A folding chair made by Daedalus was preserved in the temple of Polias at Athens\(^13\). Cypselus, who sacrificed some magnificent oxen to Zeus at Olympia, seems to have dedicated their horns\(^14\).

Arimnestus, king of Etruria, dedicated his throne at Olympia\(^15\). A huge ornamental crater of bronze, sent as a gift by the Lacedaemonians to Croesus on their alliance, came somehow 321 to Samos, where it was dedicated in the Heraeum by the Samians. At Delphi was Pindar's seat. Phryne appears to have dedicated at Thespiae the famous Love which Praxiteles made for her, on the same principle. A curious piece of quartz or some such stone, mounted upon a wooden base, was dedicated at Athens to Athena; a curiously shaped shell was found at Delphi. Some lead ore was preserved at Delos. In the temple of Heracles at Erythrae were to be seen the horns of a certain Indian ant, which were there set up for a wonder to posterity.

A few objects of this class have survived. In Corecyra was found an unhewn stone of conical shape, a kind of baetylus perhaps, bearing a very ancient inscription with the dedicator's name. This, as Six suggests, may have been meant for Apollo Agyieus, who is described as a conical pillar. Two other conical stones in Corecyra are inscribed with a river-name in the nominative. A similar stone found in Gaul was dedicated to Aphrodite.

It is perhaps this principle which suggests the preservation of laws and official documents in temples, where they were always set up; and it was also the custom to erect there the tablets which bore official decrees and lists, as well as votes of honour and gifts of citizenship.

An inscription was no necessary part of a votive offering. The mere fact of its being laid in the shrine with intent to dedicate, could suffice; and the large majority of things which have been found in sacred places, such as statuettes, articles of use, spoil of war, toys, and toilet utensils, are wholly without inscription. So, too, were the greater part of the articles named in the Inventories. But it was natural that the dedicator should wish the memory of his gift to be kept, and this we shall see later to have been a prevailing motive in the dedication; so when letters began to be commonly used, an inscription was naturally made. As it is the mark of early inscriptions to be sparing of words, and as the god to whom the offering was made would be clear from the place, (1) we may expect that the earliest dedicators contented themselves with recording their own names. But (2) a large number of ancient objects bear the god's name without a dedicator's. Many of these may have been not dedications at all, but like Ptolemocratia's "sacred pail of Venus," which sang its own song, and told by letters whose it was, they may have been bought out of temple funds for every-day use. This, however, is not true of others, such for example as the bulls of the 1 This fact has been taken to prove the votive character of the Olympian athlete statues (above, p. 167). But a thing may belong to the god, that is, may be ἵππος, without being an ἀνάθημα; for example, the tiles of his roof.

Cabiri, which were dedicated without doubt by pious worshippers; hence we are justified in recording such in this place. (3) A third class will show both devotee and deity, (a) either the names only, or (b) along with a verb; and to these will be added (4) others which offer a reason for the act, or (5) a prayer, or (6) both together. The more ambitious dedications are written in verse. Such is the main classification of the formulae, which in later times appear in many and striking variations.

The verb ἀνατίθημι, in passive sense ἀνακεῖμαι, and its derivative ἀνάθημα, are universal for the votive offering. The noun appears locally in the form ἀνάθεμα1, ἀνθεμα2 or ἀφτημα3, while ἐπίνυθετος4, in Argos ἐπάνυθεμα5, in Athens ἐπέτειος6, is applied to the dedications of the current year. For human gifts, the proper words are δῶρον and διδώναι or ἐπιδιδόναι7; but δῶρον is found early in conjunction with votive formulae, and late by itself8. For tombs, the formula is τίθημι or ἐπι-τίθημι9, sometimes ἐφίστημι10. Later the votive ἀνατίθημι loses its force, and is applied to games and months and the like11; while by its side we meet with τίθημι the simple verb12, which occurs once in an archaic dedication from Argos13, διδωμι14, ἵστημι and compounds15, even εὐχαριστώ16, and εὐχὴν coupled with τίθημι or ἀνατίθημι, ἀποδιδόναι, ἐκτελεῖν, and barbarously ποιεῖν. Even καθιεροῦν is sometimes found. Another group of words, ἰδρύω and ἱδρυμα, are used of buildings and altars, trophies and statues. κατατίθημι is used on the earliest Lesbian dedications known, which were found at Naucratis, and in Cyprus. παρακατατιθέναι and παρακαταθήκη are used of things deposited in temples for safe keeping.

(1) No deity is named. I have met with no votive offering which bears the offerer’s name in the nominative case alone; but there are examples of it in the genitive. The statue made by Tharrymachus, and inscribed “of Praxilas,” is probably one. A vase found in the temple of the Cabiri is labelled “of the Thebans”; there are similar inscriptions at Corinth and Athens.

Most of those which belong to this class have a verb of dedication added. One of the oldest is the baetylus dedicated by Mys at Corecyra, which takes the quaint form of a speech from the stone to the spectator. So also does the Corecyran bronze plate of Lophius.

Others have the commoner shape of the Olympian stone

(2) The deity’s name without the dedicator’s.

Many very ancient dedications show this type. The name appears very rarely in the nominative, as on a greave found in the temple at Olympia, which bears the legend Zeus Olympian; and perhaps on two conical stones from Corecyra, inscribed with the name of a river. It is not uncommon in the genitive case, as at Olympia, Thebes, Athens, Sparta; or in the dative, as in Sparta. Once the word “firstfruit” occurs in the nominative with the deity in the dative. Or again, the offering utters a voice and addresses the bystander. “I am the hero’s,” quoth an ancient vase of Mycenae. So say the vases of the Cabiri, and the dedications to Paphia in Cyprus. Some say more fully “I am dedicated”; and the word “sacred” may be added, or even “offering.” In a series of inscriptions from Naucratis, the offering lifts up its voice and addresses the deity, “Apollo, I am thine.” The word ἱερός is used alone sometimes to characterise offerings which are certainly votive, such as the bulls offered to the Cabiri in Boeotia, or a lance-head sacred to Apollo Ptoeus. Others have the god’s name added in the genitive, as others of the Boeotian bulls and vases, a vase of Athena Cranaia, and many more. But vases which bear this legend may have been articles of use; although their number makes it unlikely. They are found in Athens, Phocis, and elsewhere. The god’s name occurs in the dative amongst the Theban offerings, and at Athens. Finally the offering speaks, as before, in Athens and Olympia. Occasionally the dedicant’s name is added in a new sentence; as “I am of the Anakes: Eudemus offered me,” in Argos, as at Thebes, Athens, Naucratis.

(3) Both deity and devotee are named.

Some of these have nothing more than the two names. Examples are found in Athens, Boeotia, Elis, Italy, Thessaly. The patronymic may be added, and the fatherland, and the words “daughter” or “wife” sometimes occur. But most contain also the verb of dedication. These occur in Boeotia, Epirus, the Italian Locris, the Peloponnes, Phocis, Priene, Sicily. Official dedications are followed sometimes by lists of names, and the dual is very common. The fatherland and patronymic also appear\(^1\), with other such details\(^2\); the word son\(^3\) or wife\(^4\) or daughter\(^5\) is actually used. Demotic adjectives are common with the older Athenian inscriptions, rare in the offerings to Asclepius, perhaps because of the rank of the dedicators\(^6\). Further a description of the dedicatar sometimes appears; as the rhapsode of Dodona\(^7\), at Athens the fuller\(^8\), the harpist\(^9\), the potter\(^10\), the builder\(^11\), and others in combination with the word tithe or firstfruit. So we find the "cook" at Epidaurus\(^12\); perhaps "bankers" in Athens\(^13\). Officials, however, as the priests or physicians of Asclepius, do add their titles\(^14\). This is so common in later days as to need no illustration. The word ἱερὸς may be added, as in the previous section\(^15\). It is unnecessary to name the object, but this is often done in the verse inscriptions. Thus we find ἄγαλμα or "ornament," specially used of a divine statue, but not always so, in Samos\(^16\), Paros\(^17\), Melos\(^18\), frequently at Athens\(^19\). The word is applied also to a stone vase\(^20\). A human portrait is named in Olympia\(^21\), Cyprus\(^22\), and commonly in honorific inscriptions; a cauldron\(^23\) and a tripod in Athens\(^24\); a goblet in Cyprus\(^25\); an altar in Crissa\(^26\), and elsewhere\(^27\); a relief or picture in Rhodes¹, a jug and a stand in Naucratis², and war-spoils often⁸; a human statue or a pillar in Thera⁴, tables in Lesbos⁵, a slab or stone base in Asia Minor⁶; mules and men in Branchidae⁷. The word ἄγαλμα, at first an ornament, later used specially of divine figures, needs no illustration. More often, however, some periphrasis like “from the enemy” is enough⁸. An epithet of the deity is often added, and this may give a clue to the occasion of the offering. Thus Athena is addressed as Poliouchos⁹, Hygieia¹⁰, Ergane¹¹; Zeus as Oporeus¹², or Giver of Fruits¹³, or Protector of the City¹⁴, Saviour¹⁵, or god of Strangers¹⁶; Dionysus as god of the Grape¹⁷; Heracles, Averter of Ills¹⁸; Artemis, Saviour¹⁹, and so forth.

The occasion of the dedication is more clearly indicated, when the words tithe, firstfruit, or vow are added. The first two are exceedingly common in the early inscriptions of Athens, where the practice, known indeed elsewhere, seems to have been regular; as to its distribution and nature the reader may refer to the fuller discussion above²⁰. The word tithe, like other of the formulae, loses its meaning in later times; so that a man can dedicate an honorific statue as a tithe²¹. The word firstfruit also loses its meaning²². The vow is also attested for early Athens, but it is only named in the periphrastic phrases and Phocis, in Asia Minor, in the islands, such as Anaphe, Crete, Delos, and Megiste, Nisyros, in Rhodes, Thera, and in Italy. Once it appears to be used for victory in a chariot-race. The plural ἀριστήρια occurs also. Variants, all late, are εὐχαριστήριον and ἀριστεῖον, and once χάριν. We also find now and again such words as σῶτρα, ἐλευθερία, ἐκτίματρα, λύτρον. Gratitude is more freely expressed in some inscriptions; like that of Hegilochus, who acknowledges "a great share of hospitality and all manner of goodness" on the part of his adopted city.

Here the vow is sometimes paid by another than he who made it. But the later custom is to affix the word \text{ev\textchi\textovn} or \text{ev}\text{\textchi\textovn} to the simple formula; and this is found earliest in Naucratis, and in dedications of the third century or later at Athens, Argos, Messenia, Sparta, at Selinus, and Apollonia, at Cnidus and in other parts of Asia Minor, and in Anapha; Cyprus, Delos, Lesbos, Melos, Rhodes, Thasos, Thera, Thrace; further, in Boeotia, and in Greater Greece. \text{kat'} \text{ev\textchi\textovn} also occurs. Extraordinary to relate, the formula with \text{ev\textchi\textovn} is used for a late tomb in Asia Minor.

Another word \text{\textchi\textrossit\textrsi} becomes very common in later times. It is foreshadowed, like \text{ev\textchi\textovn}, by a paraphrase in the old Athenian inscriptions, \text{soi \textchi\textariv \text\textnu\textti\textdi\tdi\textovs}, but like \text{ev\textchi\textovn} is only common after the Alexandrine period, and chiefly in the Roman age. We find it in Arcadia, Attica, Boeotia.

Another group of phrases glances at the injunction of a dream or an oracle. Μαντεῖον occurs in an old Attic inscription, which is unfortunately mutilated, and θεοῦ φραδαῖς in another. The commonest phrases are κατ' ὄναρ, κατ' ὀνειρον, ὄναρ ἰδὼν, καθ' ἀραμα, κατ' ἐπιφάνιαι; once or twice ὅψιν ἰδοῦσα ἄρετήν τῆς θεοῦ, καθ' ὑπνον once in a relief offered to Zeus Xenios.

already explained. These often give in much detail the circumstances of an offering. Earlier, we find only a few examples, such as the great stone of Bybon, or now and again in the poetical inscriptions to which we shall come immediately. I need do no more than briefly indicate the varieties of the honorific class. These are dedications by the πόλις, or the δήμος, or the βουλή, sometimes both the last two together, the φυλή or the κοινόν, whether a state or guilds or a mere society of men. "By the resolution of the senate" or a like phrase is added sometimes.

The dedications are made to the gods all or singly, sometimes coupled with the people. Here the phrase loses its force and becomes a mere compliment. When we find dedications "to the community" of buildings or land for common use, and a man is spoken of as having "dedicated the bath to the young men," the word is indistinguishable from its English equivalent.

Along with the offering a prayer is commonly found. “Grant me,” says the potter of Metapontium, “to have good fame among men.” “Herodorus has dedicated me to Aphrodite as a gift, a firstfruit of his goods; to whom do thou, O queen, grant abundance, and thwart all those who falsely speak evil against him.” Aigialeus, in dedicating his firstfruit to Athena, has paid his vow, and shown gratitude to her: for which he prays that she may preserve him in well-being and make a return on her own part. Others pray that all may go well with their work, or ask for a “pleasant return.” Telesinus, in dedicating a statue to Athena, asks, in simple shrewdness, that the goddess will give him the means to dedicate another. Pyrrhis of Italy would drive a bargain, and asked his deity to give him twice as much as he had earned before. The idea of pleasing the divinity is clear in many, whether implied by the complacent “fine” or “faultless ornament,” or stated in plain terms. The verse-inscriptions often take the form of a direct address to the god, and his glory is set forth either by epithets or rarely in some other form. Artists’ names and explanatory inscriptions are sometimes added to the votive offering. This is especially common with the statues at Athens and Olympia, and with reliefs or painted tablets such as those of Corinthis. Such additions however form no part of the votive inscription.

description of the dedication in the nominative case. Such are "the supplication of Peisis" at Athens, the firstfruit in the same place, "Anaus's prayer" in Cyprus.

Speaking generally, the dedicative formulae are made in prose from the earliest times to the latest; and they keep to certain quite simple types. The most verbose expansion of the early type, which yet means no more than the simple form, is seen in Cyprus. "I am of Prototimus, priest of the Paphian," says one record, "and he dedicated me to the Paphian Aphrodite"; or "I am of the Paphian goddess; now Onesithemis dedicated me." Many of the Cyprians, who are most free in their handling of the types, add "in luck" or "with good luck," "for the best," even a note of time. But attempts at verse, more or less successful, are found quite early and in many parts of the Greek world. They are mostly hexameters, one or more, not seldom elegiacs in one or more couplets, and now and then a rude sort of iambic. Some licence is allowed in the case of proper names which may be difficult or impossible to scan. In the fourth century begins, and later grows to great lengths, the custom of adding self-glorification of all sorts, which robs the offering of its pious simplicity.

LATER USES OF THE VOTIVE FORMULA.

We have already seen that human beings were once dedicated to the gods, whether for service or sacrifice; and although an investigation of this topic does not lie within our scope, it suggested a curious development which must be mentioned, the formality of emancipation. In many Greek states, emancipation was a civil act; but in some, it took the form of a dedication of the slave to the patron deity of the city, by which act he was made free of human control, and that meant (since the deity did not enforce his claim) his own man. Witnesses or guarantors are sometimes present at the transaction, which is a legal fiction. A payment of money, and other legal processes, are occasionally alluded to; some contain the word 'sold.'

but the same seems to have been used by the Semites.1 One from Phocis2 belongs to the fourth century, but as the beginning is lost, whether the votive formula was used or not cannot be made out; most of them date from the third or second century, or even later. The custom depends, however, on the right of sanctuary, known to us from the stories of Cylon and Pausanias, and from the ancient practice of sparing captives who took refuge in a temple3. Slaves too might be protected from their masters by fleeing to the Theseum or the fane of the Eumenides at Athens4.

In Coronea5, Orchomenus6, and Chaeronea7, the owners dedicate their slaves to the Egyptian gods, Sarapis, Isis, and Anubis, under certain restrictions; if any one in Coronea infringes his liberty, he is to pay a fine of a thousand drachmae to those gods. At Lebadea, the slave was dedicated to Zeus the king and Trophonius, whose priests were charged to make good the act against aggression8. In Stiris, they are dedicated to Asclepius9; in Daulis, to Athena Polias10. The only Messenian emancipations which have been found are too badly broken clearly to show whether they were dedicatory; but as a fine has to be paid to Limmatis they are likely to have been so11. a very simple formula, are found at Taenarum\(^1\): it should be remembered that Poseidon was the god of the ancient population of Laconia, who were reduced to slavery by their conquerors\(^2\). Manumissions of the same class have been found at Olympia\(^3\), and allusions to such are known in Cos\(^4\) and Epidaurus\(^5\).

In the second place, curses are often conceived of as a kind of votive offering. The curses have been found in Attica, Boeotia, Megara, Italy, Crete, Cyprus, Asia Minor, and Africa. The specimens to be quoted are not older\(^7\), and most are later, than the fourth century; but the practice was old without doubt. Plato mentions it\(^8\), and there are allusions in many other classical authors. Its association with the worship of the dead suggests a hoary antiquity, since this worship is characteristic of the earliest inhabitants of Greece. The practice of writing the spells backwards may perhaps have begun when Greek was written that way\(^9\). Curses show a very strange and pathetic side of ancient religion. They were commonly used under the influence of passion; but to judge from the numerous remains, the people would resort to them on any provocation. One could pardon the man who complains of assault and battery\(^10\), the lover who invokes curses on a rival or a faithless mistress\(^11\); but there is small excuse for the unsportsmanlike boxer who prays that his antagonists may lose their strength\(^1\), or the litigant who asks that his opponent's tongue may be as cold as the lead he writes on\(^2\), or the ill-wisher who invokes misfortune on his friends, feet and hands, soul and body, their works and their craftsmanship, their brothers, sisters, wives, children, and associates. The descriptions are full: here is a helmet-maker\(^3\), there a maker of panspipes\(^4\); shoemaker\(^5\), silk-spinner\(^6\), carpenter\(^7\), actor\(^8\), are anathematized with all the brains in their heads and all the goods in their shops. One aggrieved person "sends a letter to the spirits and Persephone" to call their attention to "Tibitis, who does me wrong, her daughter, husband, and her three children, two girls and a boy." The curses are as detailed as that of the Jackdaw of Rheims. Hermes is the favourite god for these invocations, and others are Demeter, Persephone, Hades, the Earth, and mysterious demons\(^10\). The curses are engraved on leaden sheets, and buried in the earth, often in the tombs\(^11\).

The material is in later times supposed to be symbolic, whatever were the original motive for using it: "as this lead is useless, so be so-and-so useless\(^12\)," or "as the lead is cold, so grow he cold\(^12\)." In the Attic inscriptions, the formula is generally καταδίδω "I bind"; but we find also "I send as a gift\(^14\)," and "I deposit\(^15\)." The Boeotians have καταδίδημι or καταγράφω\(^16\); παραδίδωμι\(^17\) occurs in imprecatory inscriptions on tombs. It is hard to draw the line at this period between votive offerings and other gifts from the formulae used; but we are justified in mentioning them here, because a certain number contain the technical term. The Furies also claim the bloodguilty as “dedicated” to themselves. Those documents which were found at the shrine of Demeter at Cnidus begin with ἀνιεροῦ or ἀνατιθημι (ἀνατιθητεῖ)². These also, with another from south Italy, show that it was a custom to dedicate a lost or stolen article to a deity, with a curse for those who kept it; and so apparently with false coins.³ Hegemone of Cnidus devotes to Demeter and the Maid the bracelet she lost in the gardens of Rhodocles; good luck to him who brings it back, but if the possessor do not, then let the gods see to it.⁴ Collyra of Bruttium devotes to the temple officials a cloak and ornaments which Melita will not return to her; Melita must pay the goddess twelve-fold and a measure of incense, and may she not die till she does it.⁵ Later we see the word ἀναθεματικοῦ in use, and the familiar “anathema” in St Paul’s Epistle will be remembered.⁶ The curse itself is sometimes called κατάθεμα, a curious opposite of ἀναθεμα, quite appropriate to the buried lead.⁷ One tablet promises a sacrifice if the prayer should be answered.⁸ A large number of names inscribed on lead were found in a tomb in Euboea; it seems possible that they were intended as curses,⁹ although their number is against that supposition.

The curse is even found combined with a relief in the sanctuary of Men at Coula. Artemidorus, having been insulted by Hermogenes and Nitonis, denounced them to Men in a votive tablet (πιπτάκιον); whereupon Hermogenes, punished by the god, offered a propitiatory sacrifice and changed his ways.¹⁰ Two orphans sacrifice to the same god, and offer a relief representing an altar, a man and a boy, for his protection against the evil devices of their enemies. Again: Scollus has borrowed money from Apollonius, and refuses to repay; Apollonius devotes Scollus to Mother Atimis and Men Tiamou, by whom Scollus dies. His son paid the debt, and this pillar records the recipient's gratitude. As the hand held up is carved on a curse-slab, it may be that the bronze votive hands in the same position found in the temple of Artemis at Arcadian Lusi, were dedicated for some such purpose.

With the further developments, when Semitic and Gnostic titles appear, El, Michael, Nephtho, Sabaatho, and the portentous 'Ephesian' nonsense-jingles, we have no concern. It may however be worth remarking, that the formulae of cursing have remained much the same for two thousand years, and I am much mistaken if they are not still in use. At least, "binding-spells" or δέματα are still the terror of the Greek bridegroom.

The votive type is also used for money gifts or legacies given to a shrine for paying the cost of sacrifice, and the like. So Agasicratis of Calaurea dedicates to Poseidon three hundred drachmae for buying victims. So the money sent by king Attalus to Delphi, for education and the keeping up of sacrifices, was sanctified to the god that the gift might be in force for ever. Diomedon of Cos left property by will for founding a shrine, as Epicteta did in Thera, and the same thing is known in North Greece.

There remains to mention in a brief word the Decrees of the Greek states. These did not adopt the votive formulae, except in so far as θεοί was sometimes prefixed; but often compiled in 1798 in the island of Calymnos (see Folk-Lore x. 156 ff.).

when they recorded an alliance they adopted the scheme of the sacrificial votive relief: the personified figures of the contracting states joining hands, with an altar beside them. A sacrifice ratified the treaty as a matter of course. The gesture is more than a mere greeting; it is the solemn symbol of friendship or pact; and the scene is the memorial of the solemn libation and sacrifice done to ratify the pact. The curse or sanction is usually recorded in them.

The offerings when brought by the worshipper, after the proper invocation and sacrifice had been made, were then laid on the table, or set up in the precinct, doubtless under direction of the officials. Statues, large vases, tripods, carven slabs, and other such things were placed upon bases which stood all round in the precinct, or sometimes within the temple itself. The bases were shaped to suit the offering, but very many offerings stood on small pillars; and the inscription was commonly graven upon the base. The offering was often fixt in a slab of stone, and some such have survived; in other cases the marks of attachment or a sunken panel are still to be seen. The hosts of smaller offerings were arranged within the temple or its storehouses, such as the treasury 1, or the show places of separate states 2. Things of no value, such as the clay figures or models, were, no doubt, deposited upon the holy table for the nonce, and afterwards (like the tapers in a Catholic church) removed by the attendants. What became of the objects in gold or silver which abound in the fifth and succeeding centuries, we can say with some certainty. I combine into one picture the information from several sources, as there is no reason to think that the customs greatly differed in different parts: indicating at the same time what those sources are.

When the offering was brought, it was entered with the giver's name upon an official list 3, which would be used later for checking. Sometimes a number 4, a letter of the alphabet 5 or other sign 6, was inscribed on them singly or in groups, with the weight of the metal. They were then placed on shelves or affixed to the wall in batches or rows 7, or hung over the door or windows, in fact wherever it might be convenient 8. They were generally placed in order as they came 9, but objects of the same kind were often kept together. Crowns and other such objects, and others in strings, were hung on the walls. As long as there was room, there they all remained; but if necessary they were then stored in boxes 10 or in store chambers.

assorted. Thus we find whole collections of crowns\(^1\) or bowls\(^2\) or silver hydriae catalogued together. So too the other things, bronze articles, statues and the like, often had their own place\(^3\); Artemis Brauronia\(^4\) and Hera of Samos\(^5\) had a huge wardrobe of clothes. The articles themselves were often ticketed or inscribed with the names of the givers, and other details in prose or in verse.

Each year a board of magistrates (ten at Athens under presidency of the strategus) was appointed to take stock of the treasures. At Athens these were the “stewards of the sacred moneys,” whom we find in a very early inscription collecting and cataloguing the bronze articles\(^6\). Later we have regular accounts of them for a few years preceding and following 400, and for the middle of the fourth century\(^7\). At Athens, besides the Acropolis records, we have others for the Asclepieum\(^8\) and the shrine of the Hero Physician\(^9\). The new gifts of the year were described in detail\textsuperscript{1}, with nature, weight, and inscription (if any); the older ones named. Sometimes those which were broken were repaired, but for the most part they were left alone until they fell to pieces or until there was need to make room for more\textsuperscript{2}. What followed then may be told in the words of the Oropan inscription. “Since some of the plate on the table of Amphiaraus has become useless, and some is in need of repair, while some of the offerings on the walls have fallen down,” three men were to be chosen, who were to receive such articles from the hierarchs, and to melt them down under supervision. A portion of the gold was to be kept as a sample, the rest to be recast as a golden bowl. The names of all those whose offerings were thus treated were to be inscribed on stone, together with the weight and description of each offering\textsuperscript{3}. Allusions to this practice are found elsewhere. Thus at Delos a bowl takes the place of a condemned vessel\textsuperscript{4}; or certain articles are said to be handed over to the workmen\textsuperscript{5}; in Athens we have a crater made from the freedmen’s bowls\textsuperscript{6} and bowls made from melted crowns\textsuperscript{7}. The same practice is still kept up in the Levant. At Tenos, the countless offerings are cast in the shape of hanging silver lamps, or the silver is sold and the money used in beautifying the precinct or in public works. The same is done to my knowledge at Ayassos in Lesbos and in Syme, and doubtless enquiry would show it to be done elsewhere. Amongst other things, the road and harbour mole at Tenos have been built by this means, and a road at Ayassos. The silver bowls or hydriae which were thus made in ancient times were kept as part of the temple treasure, almost as convenient as ingots and more beautiful, until they were wanted for public purposes. Objects of clay, images and vases and such things as were of no intrinsic worth, when their number became overwhelming, were put in store-rooms or finally buried in trenches class by class. Store-chambers have been found at Camarina, at Cnidus and in Cyprus; and trenches, in which the objects were laid side by side and buried, in the Cabirium, Corcyra, Delphi, Elatea, Naukratis, Olympia, Praesus in Crete, Tarentum, perhaps Paestum; probably in Argos, Tegea, Camarina, Catania, Megara Hyblaea.

It is assumed by some that the articles were intentionally broken either in order to sanctify them more effectually (as savages do for the dead) or to prevent their being turned to profane uses. The same reason is assigned for the inscriptions scratched on earthen vases. This cannot have been a general practice, because many hundreds of these offerings are still whole. The idea is not without parallels, and the assumed custom is possible, but it was certainly not always followed.

What became of the larger objects we cannot certainly say. That so many bronze statues were stored together in the Bronze House on the Acropolis of Athens would suggest that the less recent ones were commonly so disposed of. The fact that so many female statues, made within a few years, were standing and were thrown down at the time of the Persian invasion, points in the same direction. The number of such offerings must have been enormous; and got rid of somehow they must have been, unless there were any special reason in the fineness of the object or the fame of its maker or dedicator, to leave it unmolested.

The number and variety of the objects dedicated may well cause surprise. In Delos, we find about sixty different kinds of vessels; and there were some sixteen hundred phialae in the temple of Apollo alone, smooth, fluted, figured, or chased, damascened or inlaid with gold, set with gems, some of gold solid. There were fifty or more golden crowns of all sizes; with rings, bangles, necklets, bracelets, anklets, chains, brooches, headbands, earrings, scentbottles, rouge pots, and fans. All manner of weapons were found there: helmet, shield, and spear, bows, arrows, ox-goad, dirks, with ship's beak and rudder. There were anvil and spindles, figures of human beings and of animals, bails and discs, and other things nondescript. The same variety is seen in the other great shrines, and is of importance as we shall see for the interpretation of the idea which votive offerings imply.

GENERAL SKETCH

OF THE CUSTOMS CONNECTED WITH VOTIVE OFFERINGS, THEIR ORIGIN, AGE, DISTRIBUTION, AND MEANING, TOGETHER WITH A CONSIDERATION OF CERTAIN QUESTIONS ARISING OUT OF THEM.

We are now in a position to take a review of the whole subject.

The period we are concerned with is comparatively short. True, there is evidence that the custom of dedicating divine images at holy shrines is very ancient. Even if we set aside the rude female idols of stone, which have been found in the islands and rarely on the mainland of Greece\(^1\), we have for example in the Argive Heraeum a series of idols, ranging in an unbroken series from the archaic Greek period back through all periods intermediate to the Mycenaean age, and earlier still, for how many centuries we can but dimly guess\(^2\). We have evidence also, that tithes and firstfruits were offered by the country people to their most ancient gods, and there is a probability that this custom is as old as the other\(^3\). So too in the ritual of the dead, food and drink, with the vessels containing it, were offered at the tomb from the Mycenaean age to historic times\(^4\). But apart from these, where evidence as to motive and meaning is vague, the practice of dedicating what are technically called ἀναθηματα, that is permanent memorials of a special benefit, at first (as the name denotes) intended to be hung in the shrine, but including later all objects which embodied the idea, the evidence for this practice is confined within narrow limits. I do not imply that it was unknown before, but we can only trace it where it is attested by the use of a fixt formula; we depend, that is, upon literary and epigraphical evidence. With the aid of this evidence, we are able to interpret the archaeological remains in certain holy places; and these remains show a variety of new features within the same limited period.

The Homeric poems attest the dedication of things which have a material value, as Hecuba's robe, and a temple full of fine ornaments; but they say little of the dedication of things for their meaning sake, such as blood-stained spoils of war; and in neither case does the poet use for them the regular formula of later days, which he indeed uses in a different sense. But Hesiod speaks of dedi¢cing his prize as a matter of course, and uses the proper verb of dedication. Now the formula is necessarily later than the beginning of practice, but not much later; and if Homer records a few instances of the practice, but without the formula, we may fairly infer that the practice was beginning in his day amongst the people he wrote for. But it was recognised in Hesiod's day; therefore it became recognised somewhere between the two, that is between the eleventh and the eighth centuries. The archaeological evidence enables us to trace the custom back to the eighth century or thereabouts at Olympia, at Argos perhaps further; and the oldest offerings in Delphi, Lusi, Thebes, perhaps Athens, Coreyra, and Samos can hardly be much later. Again: in the fourth century the motives of dedication undergo a change so markt as to rob the custom of all its meaning, except in case of deliverance from disease and peril, and in other cases with humbler folk. The

5 This does not imply that ἀναθήματα were not offered by the humble country folk, or by another race than the Achaeans.
6 This coincides with the decay of religious faith in general. It has been pointed out, for example, that in the fourth century the character of sepulbeginning of memorial dedication, then, other than the vaguest sort, may be placed in the ninth or tenth century, its end in the fourth; while as in the case of religion and the fine arts generally, its noblest and fullest expression is seen in the sixth and fifth.

It was a very simple conception of the deity which suggested the votive offering. He was a being not very different from his worshipper, and likely to be pleased with a gift. Croesus, it will be remembered, burnt his offering, that Apollo might get it sooner\(^1\), just as offerings made to the dead were burned or buried according to the conception of the other world which the survivors had. A god needs a house to live in, and furniture; even food does not come amiss, and the libation and sacrifices provide for this. If he gives wealth or a lucky windfall, some acknowledgment must surely be made: a portion of the wealth, the best piece of the find, will content him, and the worshipper may enjoy the rest. So the warrior dedicates a part of his spoil, the tradesman or farmer a part of his profits. If the god is offended by a breach of law, wilful or unwitting, amendment must be made in proportion as would be necessary in social life. Is the votary delivered from peril or sickness, it is natural to acknowledge the favour in the same way. If he has cause to pray, he will be wise to accompany his prayer with a vow, and even perhaps to do his part beforehand\(^2\).

The essence of a votive offering is freewill. It may be customary, as the firstfruits; of fixt proportion, as the tithe; chral monuments undergoes a change such that it is no longer possible to see any religious meaning in the designs. Examples of rank impiety have been given above, pp. 50\(^2\), 72, 113, 283.

\(^1\) Herod. i. 50. The god enjoyed the smell or smoke of the offering, as men enjoyed it by eating. \textit{Il.} xxiv. 70 οὖ μοι ποτὲ βωμὸς ἐδεέτο δαιώρ, λαβὴς τε κνίσης τε' τὸ γάρ λάχομεν γέρας ἣμείς; i. 66 αἱ κεν πῶς ἄρχων κνίσης αὐτῶν τε τελείων βούλεται ἀντίσας ἡμῖν ἀπὸ λοιγῶν ἀμώναι; and of a human feast \textit{viii.} 549 κνίσην ἐκ πεδίοις ἀνεμου φέρον οὐρανῶν εἰσω ἴδειαν· τῆς δ᾿ ὁτι θεοὶ δατέοντο οὐδ’ ἔθελον. Fire was specially the gods’ γέρας, which Prometheus stole and gave to men. The natives of Borneo have the same idea as Croesus; when they send a message to the omen-birds, they light a fire and ask the fire to tell the bird (Haddon, \textit{Head-Hunters}, 337, 344).

but it must not be compulsory, or it becomes a tax. This does not imply that the deity is not to resent a denial of his share. Such a motive as led the Siphnians to refuse a tithe of their mines to the deity whose act they saw in the finding of them, would be mean towards men, and was no less so towards Apollo; Artemis may fairly retaliate if her firstfruits are withheld: but custom is not compulsion. The element of compulsion is one of the two which rob the later offerings of their moral worth. This premised, the ruling motive in the giver may be one of three: thanksgiving, propitiation, or prayer. By far the commonest in earlier times is the thank-offering; I know of one only where fear is stated as the ruling motive. Offerings may be made in fulfilment of a vow, but one of these motives will also be present. A few of early times, and many later, declare obedience to the bidding of the god; whilst the divine oracle was not above asking payment for its help. When complete, the offering stands as a memorial for ever: it may be to remind man of God's providence, or to remind the god of his worshipper's gratitude, or both. But from the fourth century the giver desires his gift to be a memorial to men of his own piety or virtue, or of his own great achievements; and the latter motive, as we have seen, began earlier still. Thus the votive offering becomes a means of self-glorification; and this is the other motive which robs it of its moral worth.

This distinction usually made between public and private offerings rests on no principle; because the same feeling prompts both, and they are both meant to have the same effect. Public offerings are more often customary, as public prayers are now-a-days; being dedicated (for instance) by sacred embassies or upon recurrent festival days. Yet they are no less free, that is compelled by no law. On the other hand, public offerings may be occasional, as in the dedication of war-spoil; and private offerings may be customary, as those of pilgrims or mystics. Again: public offerings may be more magnificent; but if a man gave what he could afford, he felt that the gift was no less acceptable because it was small.

We find that these gifts are appropriate to all times and seasons. Gratitude for success in war or the games, for prosperity in one's calling, for unexpected good luck, for deliverance from disease or peril, for election to an honourable post, for the care which has brought a man to his manhood, a woman to her marriage day; propitiation of the mighty dead or of the gods who are mightier still, as a precaution or in consequence of a fact; prayer for help and deliverance, relief from adversity or continued prosperity: there is no part of human life which is not included under one of these.

Neither is there anything in the world which cannot become a votive offering. Yet for all this infinite variety, the offerings fall into a few well-defined classes. There are two main divisions: I. Material: objects which are given for their own value, and II. Ideal: objects which are given for what they imply. It is obvious that any object of the first class may on occasion be found under the second; and we shall often find the same object dedicated under both heads. Both are prompted by the same feeling, fear, hope, or gratitude; but the first involves a cruder conception of the deity than the other.

I. Material: Objects given for their own intrinsic worth. Here the thing given is regarded as payment made to the god, whose favour is either bought, or requited with something like an equivalent.

(1) First among these come such things as the god might be supposed to need, if he were a being not unlike mankind. He must, for example, have his house and grounds, with the proper furniture for all uses, and beautiful things for his delight. Thus the dead and the hero spirit are allotted their precinct and shrine, the patron deity his portion of land conquered or newly settled, wherein a temple must be built and furnisht. Buildings such as the shrine or temple, the treasury or show-chamber and the colonnade, may be erected for any reason proper to the subject we have in hand. Danaus erects one when he has acquired the kingdom of Argos. For success in war, so do Heracles and Theseus, and the Doriens after their invasion; the Athenians thus testify their gratitude to Pan, when he appeared to Pheidippides; the Eleans build the great sanctuary of Zeus at Olympia. Salvation from plague or pestilence is repaid by the shrine of the Eumenides at Athens, by the temple of Apollo at Bassae; from flood, by that of Hera at Sparta. Diomedes thus returns thanks for being saved from shipwreck, Themistocles when Artemis revealed to him in a dream how they plotted against his life.

Odysseus erects three shrines on winning his wife, Helen builds one at Argos for the birth of a daughter, the women of Elis long barren when at length they discover themselves to be with child. Hypermestra, acquitted on trial for her life, uses the same means of acknowledgment. In expiation of a crime the temple of Artemis at Tegea is built. Even the part of a temple might be separately dedicated, as Croesus and other kings dedicated the pillars of the great temple at Ephesus. The treasury may be built for success in war, or for prosperity in trade. The colonnade occurs also as a war dedication; that called of the Persians at Sparta, that built by the Athenians at Delphi.

Greek Votive Offerings.

So with the furniture of the sacred place. An altar is erected after the victory of Plataea\(^1\), or on acquittal of a charge of life and death, as that of Orestes\(^2\). We also find altars dedicated as a memorial of office by Peisistratus the younger, by the archons of Amorgos, and by the magistrates of the Athenians\(^3\). Numerous other altars are known, some being apparently memorials of some feast or ritual act\(^4\). These may often belong to the second class; and the image of the deity usually does, unless it were the original cult-image; but of the dedication of these we have no information. But where garments were used to clothe it, they may be placed here. Hecuba offers a robe to Athena, with a prayer for Troy’s salvation. Amasis sends embroidered garments to Samian Hera for friendship sake, to Lindian Athena because of ancient kinship\(^5\). Periodical offerings, which later came to partake of the ideal, were made by the Athenians to Athena\(^6\), the Eleans to Hera, and the Amycleans to Apollo\(^7\). Garments were also dedicated to Cabirus, Tegean Athena, to Olympian Poseidon, to Artemis at Athens, and to Hera at Samos\(^8\). We find no dedications of articles directly intended for the use of man in the sanctuary, until comparatively late days; but then the repairs of the sanctuary\(^9\), and the supply of tables or basins for worshippers\(^10\), are the recognised duty of priestly officials. When Livia dedicated the golden E at Delphi, and probably when the Athenians dedicated theirs of bronze, they simply gave what were meant as ornaments to the sanctuary. What the original wooden E was, who offered it, and why, we have no means of knowing\(^11\).

(2) For the support and glorification of the shrine the offering of tithes and firstfruits in kind must have been customary from the earliest times: whether given by farmers, breeders, or hunters, whether corn, grapes, and oil, or slaves and captives. The tithe of precious minerals was given on the same principle; and many offerings are recorded, or still exist, which must be regarded as valuables in bulk. Of this kind are Rhodopis' iron bars, ingots of silver, and such manufactured articles as tripods, cauldrons, and axes, perhaps knives, wheels, and shields in early times, gold and silver bowls or crowns in later. The tripod is dedicated for war, and as a musical prize, and large quantities of tripods and cauldrons have been found which bear no record. Axes, which are also frequently found, are dedicated as tithes and therefore as articles of value. The immense number of bowls, not infrequently their uniform size, and the fact that small objects were melted and cast in this form, appear to show that they were often regarded as so much precious metal stored in a convenient way. The large mixing-bowls, however, and sprinkling-bowls or lavers, may have been used, but they also were probably intended as 'ἀγάλματα'. The bowl is dedicated by Alyattes for cure of disease, by Croesus and Xerxes for propitiation, by the Samians as a trade-tithe, by Pausanias as a memorial of his rule at Byzantium, by ordinary persons as a firstfruit, by a courtezan with the same idea, by a woman for childbirth, by slaves who win a lawsuit, by theori and temple officials at Delos, by the Ergastinae at Athens. Marble and bronze sprinkling-vessels are dedicated as tithe or firstfruit at Athens\(^1\). Rings, bracelets, jewels, and ornaments of all kinds are also offered for their own value on many different occasions\(^2\). Lastly, coins are offered in large numbers at all shrines, and probably on any cause; the fines (so far as they can be considered votive) are nearly always estimated in current money\(^3\).

(3) Thirdly, those objects which come under the title ἀκροθίνα were dedicated for their own worth. Anything specially rare or precious would be an acceptable gift to a deity of like passions with the giver. Thus we find preserved in temples marvellous things like the stone which Cronus swallowed\(^5\), a thunderstone or meteorite\(^6\), things too mysterious and precious for human hands to hold; or oddities, such as the mammoth’s bones\(^7\); or relics of old days, the arms and armour of heroes long since dead\(^8\), the sceptre of Hephaestus\(^9\), the throne of Arimnestus\(^10\), the golden tripod of the wisest man\(^11\); things famed in legend, Eriphyle’s necklace\(^12\) or Daedalus’ wings\(^13\). The choice piece of war-spoil was dedicated as a matter of course: a fine piece of statuary, a divine image, the throne of Xerxes, the manger of Mardonius, the Theban lamp which Alexander admired\(^14\). The idea in this custom may have been originally the same as caused Polycrates to cast away his precious ring.

II. Ideal: Objects dedicated for what they imply. But by far the greater proportion of votive offerings imply something more than the crude notion of payment; for the Greeks knew as well as we do that the thought sanctifies the deed. The whole of this class may be called ideal, as meaning more than appears on the surface; and memorial, as intended to keep the god's beneficence before the mind of the man, and no less the man's piety or gratitude before the mind of the god. This persistent idea is illustrated on the one side by the silver sow of Epidaurus\(^1\), on the other by the recurrence of the word 'memorial' on so many early inscriptions\(^2\). In the later age, when thoughts were no longer understood only, but exprest, the idea is distinctly stated: as when Akeson, in offering a relief to Asclepius, says, "you know why; if not, this tablet will remind you."

(1) The most obvious offering of a grateful worshipper is the Image of the Patron Deity. The deity is most naturally represented in his traditional form, that is the image will reproduce in essentials the cult-image of the temple. In early times we must not expect any subtily of thought; an armed god need not imply that the offering is made for success in war, but may mean only that the god in that place was familiar in this guise. Nor can we otherwise interpret the seated statuettes of Athena found in Athens, of Demeter in Eleusis, or the figures of Artemis with the fawn found in Corcyra. The absence of all attributes, again, implies nothing as to the aspect of the deity which the worshipper may have in mind; if the naked statues of Boeotia and Samos were really Apollo, as I have given reason to think, we may infer that the local type was without attributes. To interpret the 'Maidens' of Athens, Delos, Eleusis, Massalia, Naxos and other places as a kind of domestic type of the goddess, is to go beyond the evidence. The interpretation may be right; but on the other hand, these figures may represent simply the cult-statue drest in its ceremonial robes. It is true, however, that about the beginning of the fifth century we find the beginnings of differentiation by attribute: when, for example, the statue offered for a naval victory is made to hold a ship's beak in the hand. On the other hand, the dedication of an armed Athena by a baker woman is conclusive against the strict connexion of attributes with occasion.

In early times, the deity does not necessarily vary with the occasion. We find a statue dedicated for success in war to Zeus as early as the seventh century, when the Spartans conquered the Messenians; and there are many more. Others honoured in the same way on a similar cause are Athena, sometimes differentiated as Promachos, Aphrodite, Apollo, Artemis the Saviour, Hermes or Heracles, Pan, Poseidon, and the Saviour Demigods. For deliverance from plague and pestilence, we have statues of Hermes Ram-bearer and the Locust Apollo in the fifth century, Asclepius in the fourth; in childbirth, Phaedra dedicates an Eileithyia, another woman an Artemis. Magistrates, tradesmen, and artists offer the Athenian 'maidens,' often as tithe; a baker offers a statuette of Athena armed; Bathycles, after completing the Apollo at Amyclae, offers statues of Artemis and of the Graces. Many statues of Zeus, and doubtless of others, are recorded, both public and private dedications, without cause assigned. The herms in the Street of Hermae at Athens, dedicated by all sorts of people, amongst others by Cimon after the Eurymedon, were perhaps a recognition of good fortune in general rather than meant to refer to a special occasion. Small images, in bronze or terra-cotta, of uniform type, were dedicated in hundreds on occasions now unknown, and have been found of Athena on the Acropolis of Athens, and the Cranaean shrine, of Demeter in Eleusis and Tegea and Cyprus, of Aphrodite in Cyprus and Naukratis, of Artemis in Athens and Corecyra, and of Menelaus and Helen in Sparta, a few of Zeus in Olympia and Dodona, of Apollo in Delphi1. The image of Zeus was bought with fines at Olympia, that of a 'maiden' by Themistocles at Athens2. We may perhaps add the image of a goat, dedicated by the Phliasians to propitiate the goat constellation3.

(2) The deity represented in his power. I have given reasons for doubting whether in the classical age the attributes of the deity could be used to differentiate the various aspects of his power. I do not imply that the attributes were not meant originally to express his power, because I believe they were; only that in dedicating statues they were reproduced conventionally, because the type had become fixt. Once the type is fixt, innovations such as the representation of Apollo with a spear, are few4. The same must be said of those reliefs which show the god or hero in his conventional aspect, as armed man, rider, hunter, or the like. We must therefore read no inner meaning in the reliefs of Heracles with club and lionskin5, Dioscuri armed and mounted6, the Saviour God holding the war-axe7. These types could be used for different occasions; thus the armed Apollo appears on one relief which was offered for a breach of temple rules8, and a harpist relief is inscribed with the title Κουφοτρόφος9. But the idea of the divine power, if vague, was there; and at the end of the fifth century finds a clearer expression in the reliefs which show Aselepios visiting the sickbed, diagnosing or applying remedies to the patient10. He even appears, like the saint in

2 Pages 311, 317. We must not suppose that any allegory was implied. There is no reason to think that the gift was taken to mean the triumph of the deity over wrongdoing, but the motive here will be as simple as in other dedications of the divine image.

some modern picture, guiding a team of runaway horses to a safe place\(^1\). Similar reliefs were dedicated by women in childbed, not only to Asclepius but to others\(^2\). One there is, which shows a group of goddesses, the nurse and child\(^3\); one, the act of birth\(^4\). The 'nursing mother' appears on reliefs or suckling the new-born babe, in some series of statuettes, but these are probably meant for the mother herself\(^5\). The principle is the same, when Victory drives the victor's car\(^6\), perhaps where in the Corinthian pictures Poseidon and Amphitrite appear in their chariot\(^7\). So also with a relief from the Athenian Pythium, which represents the deity seated on the oracular tripod\(^8\). The 'harpist' reliefs may also be included\(^9\), and those where Artemis stands armed, or shoots at the prey\(^10\).

(3) The Human Activity, the Act or Process blest by the god, may equally be represented. This meets us early in allegorical form, some mythological or heroic precedent being chosen which suggests the later event in plastic or pictorial art as Pindar's myths suggest it in poetry. The same principle is exemplified in the pediments of Aegina and the metopes of the Parthenon, or the architectural carvings of Treasuries at Delphi and Olympia. Tellias commemorates his victory by a group of Heracles and Apollo striving for the tripod\(^11\); the battle of Oenoe suggests a group of the Seven against Thebes and the Epigoni\(^12\); the sack of a hostile city is commemorated by a model of the Wooden Horse\(^13\); the people of Heraclea Pontica, mindful of their eponym, dedicate groups representing the Labours of Heracles\(^14\); others go to the Homeric poems for inspiration. A step further, and the human instruments are more vividly suggested. A group commemorating the battle of Marathon includes protecting deities, eponymous heroes, and the victorious commander; the human element is stronger in the memorial of Aegospotami; and when we come to Attalus of Pergamus, the human affray is modelled realistically side by side with the heroic battles of ancient times and the war of gods and giants. Lastly, the human battle is represented alone in some relief carving of a cavalry skirmish or a sea-fight, sometimes raised to a higher level of thought by the figure of Victory standing beside a trophy.

Perhaps the battles of Marathon and Oenoe were commemorated by votive paintings; the Lamian war certainly was so. How far the rank and file used this pious wont is not clear; but it seems unlikely that Corinth was alone in its series of terra-cotta tablets. In these it is hard to interpret the scenes which represent Homeric combats or the fights of armed men as anything but a soldier’s thank-offering.

The human act might also be indicated by human figures engaged in the act, or so posed or equipt as to suggest it. Thus Battus in his chariot was dedicated by the Cyrenaeans at Delphi “because he founded the colony”; and Cleobis and Biton were represented in the Argive Heraeum, no doubt in such a way as to recall the act of filial piety which won them the best gift of the gods. Of this class are the statuettes of armed warriors from the seventh century in Calaurea, Cyprus, Dodona, Laconia, Olympia, Thebes, and their ideal character (as opposed to portraiture) is clear from the fact that two men may dedicate one figure in the name of both. So too with the victor in his chariot, often raised above common life by the presence of Victory in person by his side; or the jockey on his racer. Athletes in characteristic guise are here also:

the sparring Glaucus of the fifth century, the discobolus\(^1\), the runner in act to start\(^2\), the leaper holding his weights\(^3\). An athlete absolutely without attribute, and standing stiff, ought not to be counted with these; and it has yet to be proved that such figures were truly votive. But true examples are the humble son of the people who became a knight, and stood with his horse on the Acropolis of Athens\(^4\); the "Persian horsemen" of the sixth century\(^5\); the hunter with his game, certain for the fourth century and probable earlier\(^6\); the dairy-farmer milking his cow, in that ancient cave of Crete\(^7\); sailors rowing their galley, from the same place\(^8\); the scribe of Athens, with his tablets\(^9\); the baker woman of Cyprus\(^10\), the cook of Argos\(^11\); the pregnant woman, the woman in childbirth, the nursing mother, from Argos, Athens, Laconia, Sicily, Cyprus\(^12\): perhaps the physician in his consulting chair\(^13\). In later days we have realistic presentations of a patient in the last stages of disease\(^14\).

When painting or relief-carving was in use, the scene might be more fully set out before the eye. Sometimes it is the warrior leading his captive, or two men fighting together\(^15\). A few scenes of hunting and fishing occur on reliefs, but none very early\(^16\); it is in Corinth we find clearest evidence that this custom existed. There we see every part of the potter's craft portrayed, from the digging of the clay to the working and painting, baking and export of the finisht ware\(^17\); there too huntsman and farmer, vine-dresser and statuary are seen at work, often in the gracious eye of Poseidon\(^18\). More commonly, the scene of athletic contest is represented. This may be seen on a prize vase\(^19\) or quoit\(^1\) or the base of a dedicated offering\(^2\). Oftener it is an independent painting or relief. Now it is the victor leading his horses or mounting upon his car, or driving it, while Victory crowns his head with a wreath\(^3\); again Victory stands in the car or herself drives it\(^4\); the judge places the crown upon his head\(^5\), or he offers his prize to his patron deity\(^6\). Apobatae\(^7\), athletes\(^8\), jockeys\(^9\), Pyrrhic dancers\(^10\), torchracers\(^11\), all appear in this scheme. These memorials may perhaps go back as far as the sixth century, but they are commonest in the late fifth and the fourth.

Representations of the act of worship may also be classed with these, if we may suppose the worshipper to have faith in the efficacy of prayer. Such are the sacred pomp of Orneae\(^12\) or Aegina\(^13\); the ring-dances of Olympia and Cyprus\(^14\), the dancing-girls of Corcyra\(^15\); figures (whether priestly or other) in ritual costume\(^16\), holding the knife, the bowl or jug, the jar of water, the lustral spray, known in Dodona, Cyprus, Tegea, Calaurea, Thebes\(^17\). Or again, the musician with pipes or with harp\(^18\), found in Cyprus and Tegea\(^19\). Others bear the sacrifice: as the Athenian Rhombus and his compeers of Crete, Boeotia and Tegea\(^20\), the girls bearing a pig or bird, fruit, flower, or garland\(^21\). Even hands are found, holding the fruit or victim which is to be offered to the god\(^22\). The athlete or ordinary votary with hand uplifted belongs to this class\(^23\); perhaps we should add the figures from Crete and elsewhere which are described as "saluting\(^24\)." Models of sacrificial beasts were also dedicated; such as the series of pigs at Tarentum, the "supplication of Peisis" at Athens, the three rams of Mandrobulus at Samos, the he-goat of Cleone, the cock of the Dioscuri, and many other animals inscribed with deities' names, from Boeotia and the Peloponnese. Perhaps the statues of priestesses at the Heraeum and at Hermion, later at Athens, should be added. Later we have statues of arrhephori and canephori, but I do not find these before the fourth century.

I conjecture that we should also place here statues which were dedicated by way of propitiation. It does not seem likely that a Pausanias or Timagoras, or the offending Athenian archon, would be an acceptable offering as a portrait; but the case is altered if we may suppose them to have exprest by some gesture their contrition or subordination to the god's will. Confiscated articles, such as ornaments or dress worn in contravention of temple rule, or spurious money, also belong to this class, being a memorial of the error punished by the god.

Beginning in the fifth century, and lasting well over the fourth, sporadically later, we find a more complete record of the act of cult in the reliefs. These are chiefly of three types: the dance, the prayer, sacrifice, or libation, and the feast. The first type is found in the fifth century with the Eumenides, the Graces, Hours, or Nymphs, and Pan; their distribution has been already examined. In the fourth century and later we find other deities in conjunction: Hermes, Apollo, Zeus, and even (by popular etymology) All Gods. The prayer type is exemplified with Asclepius, Bendis, and others. The sacrifice or libation type is commonest; and is found with Athena (one example being a tithe), Asclepius\(^1\), Cybele\(^2\), Apollo\(^3\), Demeter and the Maid\(^4\), Dionysus\(^5\), Hecate\(^6\), Hera\(^7\), Zeus\(^8\), the heroes\(^9\), or various combinations of these. The feast-type is common with heroes\(^10\), and is found also with Asclepius\(^11\).

It is not easy to interpret the few monuments which represent the ίερος γάμος. It is possible to regard them as offered by couples on marriage, which we know was preceded by a sacrifice\(^12\), but even so they should refer to an act of cult, perhaps the mystery-play regarded as a mythological precedent. There is no reference to anything but the power of the deity in reliefs to Artemis which I have referred provisionally to marriage\(^13\).

A more summary representation of the activity blest by the god is seen in the stone-ram of the Athenian breeder, and perhaps therefore other rams from Athens, Boeotia, Laconia\(^14\); bulls from Athens, Dodona, Boeotia, Olympia\(^15\); horses from Argos, Athens, Boeotia, Dodona, Olympia\(^16\), and half-a-dozen other places. Similar are the mare suckling a foal known in Dodona, Olympia, and Athens\(^17\); the stag brought down by hounds, from Olympia\(^18\). So an ass sums up the story of a night surprise forestalled by his bray\(^19\); a sheep tells of a treasure lost and found by a sheep's guidance\(^20\); the bull recalls how a bull led the Corecyreans to a great find of fish\(^21\); a frog, how a thirsty traveller was enabled to find a hidden spring\(^22\); a cicala, how a musician broke his string and yet won the prize\(^23\). The bronze lioness dedicated in memory of the brave Leaena sums up her story in a metaphor\(^24\). Probably we should add the hunter's hound of Athens, Delos, and Lusi\(^25\); perhaps the fighting cock of Thebes. It may be also that the Asclepian snakes were meant to recall how the temple snakes lickt a patient's sores. Here also come the models of disease and of parts of the body, as a summary method of indicating what the god's blessing has done. These begin in the fourth century, and in fine become practically universal.

(4) The Winnings. The prize or gain of the acts which have been blest is another common dedication. The earliest we know of, and perhaps almost as old as the worship of the gods, is the dedication of war-spoil, whether as a trophy upon the battle-field or in a temple. This custom is known to legend and to Homer, and dedicated arms and armour have been found in some of the most ancient sanctuaries of Greece, the cave of Mount Ida in Crete, Delphi, Dodona, Olympia. There is a continuous record testifying to this custom from Alcaeus in the seventh century until long after the Christian era. As before, these dedications are made to almost every god or goddess, and even to the heroes. A secondary development was to dedicate gold or silver, or gilt models of shields, a silver trireme, and such like: the permanent bronze trophy, and models of horses or captive women.

As with prize of war, so with the prizes won in the games or musical contests. This custom is recorded for the eighth century, if that was Hesiod's date, for the early sixth century in the person of Echembrotus, and is exemplified later by the choric tripods at Athens, the tripods of the Triopia, the stlenis, vase, crown, and what not. What were or may have been prizes have been found by excavation at Athens.
Delos, Delphi, Dodona, and Sparta. In this section too models were sometimes made, as of the tripod and the shield, in stone.

Honorific crowns come into the same category. These begin with Lysander, and grow very common indeed in the fourth and succeeding centuries, when it became a matter of course to dedicate them. States like individuals dedicate crowns of honour. All these are what may be called occasional prize; but the prize of work, although more regular, is also suitable for dedication. It is not absolutely certain that the Greek craftsman would dedicate the first specimen of his skill, or a choice piece of his own work, in gratitude for the divine help in his calling; but he did dedicate tithes or firstfruits of his profits in some form, and the form was often a piece of work made by his own hands. Thus we have Lycinus' pot, "the first he ever made"; Ephantus of Melos, with his "fine ornament"; the rival potters of Erythrae, with their superfine pots; Protogenes and his partridge; and others from Athens, Aegina, Metapontium, Naxos. So the author (from the fourth century at least) might dedicate his book, the poet his poem; and if I have rightly interpreted the Corinthian fragment, a learner might dedicate his alphabet.

The workman would also at times dedicate a picture or model of his work. One such is the picture of Mandrocles' bridge over the Hellespont, which dates from 480; possibly we may add models of the temple of Delos. Hippocrates, with grim humour, offered as the result of his labours the model of a corpse or skeleton.

The grower or breeder commemorated some special luck by models of the prize of his calling. Of this class are the golden sheaves of Delphi and Athens, the golden silphium, vine, and olives of Delos and Oropus; and perhaps one or another horse or goat, silver duck, or goose, or bronze bullock. The huntsman on the same principle dedicates a model of his prey: a hare at Samos and Priene, perhaps the deer, bears, or other game found in excavations or ancient lists.

(5) The Tool or Means. An appropriate memorial of a successful piece of work is the tool it was done with. This class is not so large as the last; but it is exemplified in legend, for example the Chest of Cypselus, and vouched for in literature from a very early date. There are a few examples of the arms or the clothes worn and used in a battle being dedicated. Earliest is the shield of Aristomenes the Messenian, from the seventh century; King Nekos of Egypt and the spear sung by Simonides come next; by Alexander's time and a little later the examples become more numerous, but there is no reason to deny this to be an ancient custom, and it never (except perhaps in Alexander's own case) loses the simplicity and dignity of olden days.

The objects used in the games were dedicated on the same principle: the victor's chariot, the weight or quoit, and doubtless did we but know others besides. Bybon's huge stone was dedicated as much for his own glory as for the glory of God, but there it is still in Olympia, where it has rested for twenty-six centuries. From the same early date come an Eleusinian leaping-weight and a Corcyrean quoit; in legend we have the quoit of Iphitus. The earliest racing-car dedicated, which is on record, is that of Arcesilas (466). As regards other tools, we have from legend the spear of Meleager; otherwise there are very few indications that the practice was ancient. Later, as exemplified in the Anthology, the custom seems to have been common enough\(^1\). In these later days, physician and author followed suit; indeed, physician's tools are not unknown as votive offerings in the early fourth century\(^2\). Even models of tools are found: a golden anvil at Delos\(^3\); sickles, pruning-hooks, and winepresses in the time of Philostratus\(^4\).

But to show that they were sometimes dedicated with a rather different idea, as things worn out, whose work is over, the evidence is slightly less scanty. The story of Cimon's bridle\(^5\), taken in conjunction with one or two epigrams of the fifth century\(^6\), and with the walking-sticks of Xenophon's host\(^7\), implies that the practice was ancient if not common. Later, the motive becomes a commonplace\(^8\). Now also the sick man's bandage and the lame man's crutch are dedicated\(^9\). Here too we have the parallel of toys, trinkets, and other such things dedicated at puberty, when the owners put away childish things\(^10\). Both arms\(^11\) and tools (e.g. loom-weights inscribed\(^12\)) have been found on sacred sites; whilst female ornaments and trinkets, brooches and pins, combs and mirrors, have turned up in Argos, Athens, Delos, Delphi, Dodona, Elatea, Tegea, Thebes, and almost in every temple which has been excavated\(^13\). Why these were dedicated, however, we cannot tell for certain; we have choice of more than one explanation. Further examples of the principle we are dealing with were Pheidon's currency-bars\(^14\) and possibly the old Attic alphabet\(^15\).

One step further, and we come to clothes or trinkets worn in time of peril. These are dedicated as things done with, but also as memorials of the peril happily by God's grace escaped. We hear little of this in early days: hardly anything in the fifth century, except captives' chains or chains intended for use on the victors\(^1\). After childbirth however something of the kind used to be done\(^2\). In the fourth century, shoes are found in the Asclepieum\(^3\); in the Anthology, men saved from shipwreck dedicate their clothes\(^4\).

As memorials of the act of worship, the clothes or ornaments\(^5\) worn by the worshippers were sometimes dedicated; perhaps, though there is no direct evidence here, the vessels used in the rite. This might explain the hosts of small cups, all of a shape, found on certain sacred sites\(^6\). Examples of the first group are the stlengides or head-ornaments in Delphi\(^7\), Delos\(^8\), Athens\(^9\), and elsewhere, and the clothes of mystae\(^10\).

The offering of the hair must not be omitted, though it is difficult to find the right place for it. It is a custom of the highest antiquity, and originally (to judge from analogy) implied that the worshipper placed himself in the power of the god; but in the classical age it was traditional and its meaning had long been forgotten. The hair is the 'firstfruit' of the worshipper, and as such it was offered at Delphi to Apollo\(^11\). It is offered to rivers and heroes; the right is absorbed by the great gods, and it is then claimed later by many of them, especially Hera and Zeus\(^12\). The long youthful hair, or the first down on the chin, is offered at puberty, or at marriage; it is also cut in mourning\(^13\). As a vow in time of peril and a dedication for safety the rite is known from Homer to Lucian and St Paul\(^14\). Sometimes the cutting of the youthful lock is kept in the god's mind by a carving or an inscription\(^15\).

Lastly, certain kinds of dedications are Allegorical. Such are those which personify the power of the god under the title of Victory; which independently is a thank-offering for war alone\(^1\), but plays a part also in agonistic reliefs\(^2\). Of the same kind are the personified statues of Good Luck and the Good Spirit\(^3\), or of Vengeance\(^4\); and such figures as Praxidica\(^5\), Damia and Auxesia\(^6\), Hygieia\(^7\). On the reliefs we also find personifications of Telete or Initiation, of the Dithyramb\(^8\), and of Good Order\(^9\): these last are not found independently, either as offerings or as deities to receive offerings. As a whole, this class is rare, but ancient. Enyalios, Eileithyia, and Lecho are probably personified epithets\(^10\); Praxidica belongs to the legendary age; Damia and Auxesia are ancient, and had a larger place in cult than appears on the face of it; Victory is a votive offering as early as Archermus, and is not uncommon in the best age.

The Epidaurian silver pig\(^11\) is also allegorical, translating a metaphor into concrete form. The allegory is more elaborate in the group of Athena perched upon a palm tree, which was dedicated after the Eurymedon\(^12\); and in the group of Alcibiades on Nemea's lap, dedicated for a Nemean victory\(^13\). A punning dedication by Comaras\(^14\), who offered the model of a strawberry, completes our list\(^15\). Allegorical figures and personifications are not unknown in the great age of Greek art\(^16\); but in the fourth century they become common, not only on decree reliefs, but elsewhere\(^17\).

It will be noticed that the portrait of the worshipper does not appear at all in the above classification. It is true that many of the examples which I have recorded have been taken by others to be portraits; but I have found no reason to believe that the portrait as such was ever dedicated by a Greek until the votive dedication had lost its meaning. I do not say that Miltiades, for example, in the Marathonian group, was not recognised for Miltiades, or that he was not represented in form and feature to the life; that may well have been so, and yet no dedicatory portrait. It makes all the difference in the world that Miltiades was part of an ideal group. So it was with all the other human figures in question which are clearly described: something of the ideal was in them, so that they suggested not this or that man, but this or that action or event. And since this principle seems never to be forgotten in the great age of Greece, I have ventured to assume it for the very few cases where nothing but the name or office of the person is given. I take it that to dedicate a portrait as such would have seemed the height of arrogance to a Greek, as the story of Pheidias and the shield of Athena implies, and as Demosthenes implies in an age when the thing was common1. And a few instances which I have yet to mention fully bear out this idea. It was no Greek, but the Egyptian Amasis, who sent two portraits of himself to the Argive Heraeum, and one to Cyrene2; it was the Asiatic Chares of Teichiusa who placed his own statue at Miletus3. These were the kind of men who would think their own image an ornament to any shrine: a peck of pride to a speck of piety. Pausanias himself did not dare to follow this example; but the colossal vanity of Alcibiades was flattered by a statue dedicated in the Heraeum4, where also Lysander and his captains, many of them men otherwise unknown, were placed side by side with the Egyptian5. If these statues were portraits and nothing more (as the words of Pausanias suggest) we have here the earliest examples of honorific statues. But meanwhile an evil leaven had been working in the whole lump. The athlete statues of Olympia were generally not dedications, but set up as an honour¹; these had accustomed men to the sight of human figures in the divine presence, and the thought had become familiar that honour might be done to a man by placing him there. This new idea was turned to account, and the statues of the famous dead were placed in temple precincts: as Pericles and Anacreon on the Acropolis of Athens², Anaximenes³ and Aristotle⁴ at Olympia, Gorgias at Olympia⁵ and Delphi⁶. Now too the statues of living men were added. Conon and his son Timotheus were placed on the Acropolis in their lifetime⁷, but without the dedicatory formula. The dedication of men like Epameinondas and Philopoemen was natural; and Alexander the Great made the honour cheap. So by the end of the fourth century we have honorific statues dedicated with all formality for trivial reasons. More, the licence becomes impiety in the golden image of Phryne; and Cottina of Sparta had the effrontery to dedicate her own image to Athena⁸.

We have seen that the ideas of the dedicator, until Greek religion began to lose its sincerity, were simple; but as many have used symbolism largely as a principle of interpretation, it is necessary to examine the question. It has been asserted, for instance, that the attributes of a deity were regarded in some sort as representing him, and that they were dedicated to him for that reason; that Artemis, say, was specially pleased by the offering of a deer, Athena by an owl, Zeus by an axe. Let us see whether there are grounds for this statement.

The objects associated with the gods are of two kinds: living creatures and inanimate things. Of the first kind are Athena’s owl and serpent, Poseidon’s dolphin, Hera’s peacock, Aphrodite’s dove or swan, the fawn of Artemis, the sacred crows of Apollo, the eagle of Zeus, the horses of the Dioscuri, the snake of Asclepius. Of the second kind are Athena’s aegis, gorgon-mask, lance, helmet, and shield; Poseidon’s trident; the bow of Artemis; the thunderbolt of Zeus; the caduceus and hat of Hermes; spear or sword, cloke, and conical cap of the Dioscuri; Heracles’ club and lionskin; Apollo’s harp or the tripod; the fawnskin and thyrsus of Dionysus.

To prove the symbolic use of these things it would be sufficient to show that the things in question were treated in the same way as their owners, that is worshiped; to prove their symbolic dedication, in default of direct statement, it must be shown that certain articles, characteristic of a deity, were dedicated to that deity and to no other. Even then the motive would not be certain, but the hypothesis might nevertheless pass for the nonce.

The first point is easily disposed of. There is no worship of the owl, the dove, the eagle, the peacock, or the fawn. The serpent comes nearer to being a symbol of Asclepius: it is credited with a share of his power, helps in his cures, and is fed by the worshippers with sacrificial cakes. It is on some occasions regarded as a kind of embodiment of the god himself; and on the reliefs takes its place almost as one of the family. But the snake is also associated with Athena, and it is never treated as an embodiment of that goddess; it is also associated with the heroes, Dioscuri and others. Since then the snake is

4 Paus. ii. 10. 3. So a serpent was said to be a hero i. 24. 7, 36. 1, iv. 14. 7. Dedications to it are only found very late, as Rev. Arch. xxvi. 27 Troiasκ. Ti. Claud. Rufus δράκοντι τῷ ὁδὲ τιμωμένῳ δῶρῳ, with relief of the snake approaching a cup.
not confined to Asclepius, nor even to the heroes, its figure must be a very imperfect symbol; for no one seeing it alone would understand what it was meant to symbolize. There are it is true reliefs which show the serpent alone, without a divine figure, and there is even a dedication to the serpent; but these may all be disregarded, for they fall after the great dividing line of the fourth century. Nor can I admit that the owl as a coin type is a symbol in the proper sense. Rather it is a shorthand mark, so to say, for Athens, which was noted for its abundance of owls, and it doubtless had for the ancients the same meaning as the Russian Bear in a cartoon of Punch, or the beaver and the kangaroo on a postage stamp. It is in fact a pictorial representation of Athens, not of Athena, and need have no more religious significance than the rose on a coin of Rhodes. Athena with the owl is recognisable for Athena with Athens in her hand, as Athena with the raven or crow is Athena ruling Corone. The Bull Dionysus, the Wolf Apollo, and such like cannot be brought in evidence; for these are not attendant animals at all, whatever their meaning may be. No one has ever yet heard of an Owl Athena, an Eagle Zeus, or a Peacock Hera. The attendant animals are therefore not treated as equivalent to their deities, and are therefore not proved to be symbols of them.

Nor is there any evidence, before the fourth century, of any tendency to treat the inanimate attributes of a deity as his equivalent. Again I must draw a distinction. There are traces of fetishism, that I freely admit. The sceptre of Hephaestus was worshiped in Lebadea; but for its own sake, not as the symbol of any god. A legend tells how Aeneas set up a spear in the market-place, and bade the people worship it; but he did not call it a symbol of Athena, of Aphrodite, of the Dioscuri.

2 At Corone she carried a crow (Paus. iv. 34. 6), which was no doubt a plastic pun like the rose. What did she carry in Ithaca? Aelian mentions (Hist. An. v. 8) that ravens were not allowed on the Athenian Acropolis, κορώνη ἤ εἰς τὴν Ἀθηναίων ἀκρόπολιν ὁυκ ἔστω ἐπιβατᾶ, but he does not say why. Perhaps because it was thought to be an enemy to the owl, Arist. Hist. An. xi. 608 a 8, Plut. de inv. et od. 537 b, Neil on Knights of Aristoph. 1051. For figures of ravens or crows, see below p. 383.
I do not know whether any one will summon to court the mad tyrant of Pherae, who worship his own murderous spear\(^1\); or the Scythian Sauromatae, who worship a dirk\(^8\), or the Arcadian chieftain in Aeschylus, who swore by a spear-head\(^9\). The stone of Cronus was regularly oiled and worshipt\(^4\); but not as a symbol of Zeus. Stones, which may have been meteoric, were deified at Thespieae and Ephesus\(^8\). To the thunderbolt were paid divine honours in Seleucia, and in the Hellenistic age\(^8\); it may be in Arcadia\(^7\) and Olympia\(^8\) at an earlier date. But fetish worship is quite a different thing from symbolism. The stones are feared for their supposed power, and were probably worshipt before iconic deities were known: they are not the distinguishing mark of a deity, abstracted from his whole figure and worshipt in his place. The only possible exception is the case mentioned by Arrian; even that is not certain, and in any case the date puts it out of court. For the other attributes as symbols there is not a particle of evidence. There is not a sign that the aegis, spear, or shield was worshipt or even held in special honour as representing Athena; there is no worship of the tripod or the lyre, of the thyrsus and fawnskin, of the trident, of the herald’s staff, of Hermes’ topboots and wideawake hat.

When we examine these attributes, they are seen to be all (with three exceptions) things of every day: club, bow, and spear, or battleaxe, helmet and shield; travelling boots, hats conical or flat; fawnskin or lionskin; sheaves of corn, a bunch of grapes; torches, hunting-spear or harpoon. They are in fact simply the properties of a character costume. If the god is to be represented before the eye as a protector, he will naturally be armed; but the arms do not distinguish between Athena and Aphrodite. Or again, in a place where the warrior rides, he may be mounted on horseback; but horse and spear do not distinguish the Dioscuri from Poseidon. If he is to be regarded as a traveller, he wears hat and boots; but they do not distinguish the Dioscuri from Hermes. Poseidon holds a trident because the trident was used in fishing, or in war, or both. Hermes bears the herald’s staff because he is herald of the gods; but Iris on the same duty carries it too. Examples of the staff exist which once belonged to human heralds; and it bears a striking resemblance to the shepherd’s crook. And as the attributes do not distinguish one deity from another, so they are not essential nor constant. If the conception is that of a deity, male or female, and nothing more particular, the deity will naturally be arrayed as a human being would be. So the simple woman’s dress does not distinguish between Athena, Artemis, and Demeter. The figures found on the Acropolis of Athens, which I have given reason to take for Athena, represent now a beautiful maiden in gala dress, now the matronly figure seated upon a throne, indistinguishable from Demeter or Hecate; or again, many possible variations of garb, the maiden simply draped holding a spear or a shield and approximating to the belligerent type in panoply with spear at thrust. The seated Demeter of Eleusis might be Athena; and at Tegea the explorers hesitate which name to use. At Erythrae, Athena holds a distaff in either hand, the embodiment no good housewifery. Apollo holds now a lyre now a bow, or again he is stark naked and unarmed. Artemis appears in the same temple now with torches, now with bow and arrow. Zeus himself, if I am not mistaken, appears at Olympia drest as a man of reverence and benevolent aspect, without thunderbolt. The truth is, that the meaning of these figures is conveyed by the whole, not laid on in the shape of external attributes. Coupled with the whole figure, the attributes have meaning; alone they have none. There are only three which were not common articles of use: thyrsus, aegis, and thunderbolt. The thyrsus was however used by human beings on special occasions, and we may suppose the god to carry it because his worshippers did, not vice versa. The aegis, again, was in all probability a goatskin once used as a cape by the people who worshiped Athena; but its origin forgotten it became a traditional ornament. Remains the thunderbolt, which as represented in art is perhaps an attempt to reproduce the aspect of forked lightning; but its origin does not matter for my purpose, as I shall be able to show that it does not help the symbolists.

This view of the divine attributes applies ex hypothesi down to the fourth century; after which a great change takes place. Now the religious conception of the gods decays, and what may to suppose that a poet can personify anything by giving it a capital letter; or that a soldier would salute his colonel's dress tunic.

6 As has been well said of allegorical figures in good art by P. Gardner, JHS ix. 57. To give meaning to the attribute alone is as crude a thought, as be called idolatry takes its place. The first trace of an abstraction of divine attributes which I have met with is in the Pomp of Ptolemy described by Athenaeus. Here amidst a magnificent spectacle of gods, heroes, and personifications, are a gilded caduceus of forty-five cubits in length, and a gilded thunderbolt of forty cubits. And Artemidorus, the man who built so many altars in Thera, when Ptolemy Euergetes was King of Egypt, engraved on a rock the figure of an eagle with a dedication to Zeus, and the figure of a dolphin dedicated to Poseidon. The same tendency is shown in a series of catalogue-marks used by the Epidaurian priests to distinguish the property of the various deities which were in their place. A number of these appear to be arbitrary, or at least they have been conventionalized out of recognition; but many are easily distinguishable as attributes which had by that date become traditional. Athena is denoted by spear and shield in outline; Artemis by an arrow drawn to the head in a bow; Poseidon by the trident; Hygieia by the snake. These of course are mere shorthand marks and bear no religious significance; but they illustrate the tendency of the day. At the same time, fanciful interpretations began to be given for the association of this or that with a deity, of which the most striking example is Plutarch’s debate on the significance of the Delphic E.

So Pausanias (vii. 23. 6) explains the torches of Eileithyia as either symbolizing the fiery pangs of childbirth, or the ushering of the child into the light of day.
If this reasoning be sound, it follows that the Greeks would not consecrate an attribute, or an attendant animal, as an equivalent for the deity himself; nor was there any reason why they should expect the deity to be specially pleased with such a gift. Let us see whether the facts fit in with this view. If I can show (1) that some attributes supposed to be specially agreeable to a deity are not consecrated to that deity at all, in kind or in model; (2) that some of those which are so consecrated, are given to other deities as well; (3) that where the reason is recorded, it is not that the thing was the deity’s attribute or attendant animal: I shall be justified in denying the principle and in leaving the burden of proof with those who uphold it. If I find this rule violated after the fourth century, I shall regard this as further evidence that the change of idea which I see in the fourth century did take place. And first as to the animals.

(1) Before the fourth century there is no recorded dedication of an owl to Athena, an eagle or a dove to Zeus, a cuckoo or peacock to Hera, a dolphin to Poseidon, or of a snake to Asclepius or the heroes. But on the other hypothesis we should expect to find whole series of these objects in the shrines.

(2) The stag or fawn was sacrificed to Artemis Laphria at certain seasons, and models of wild game are dedicated to her at Lusi. But the stag or fawn, the hare, bear, or lion are dedicated in model also to Zeus, to Cabirus, and to Menelaus and Helen, whose attendant animals they are not. Now on the other hypothesis we should expect not a few, but whole series of such dedications at the chief shrines of Artemis; yet there are none, I believe, either in Delos or in Corcyra. I have given reason to think that these models are hunters’ offerings, or that after a certain date they may be toys. If they were hunters’ offerings or toys when dedicated to Zeus and Cabirus, they may fairly be regarded as the same when dedicated to Artemis. These animals must also be taken in conjunction with the bull, the ram, the goat, the sheep, and the horse, which are also widely distributed; and if simple ideas can be suggested, that they were a memorial of an act or process, or models of prey or gain, to cover all, they are more likely to be true than a subtle philosophising reason for which no evidence can be produced.

(3) I find in the Anthology a bronze cock dedicated to the Tyndaridae, but for victory¹; and a lion dedicated to Cybele, but because the beating of the priest's tympanum saved him from a lion². Two gold eagles were dedicated at Delphi, and the reason given is not that they were symbols of Zeus, but that they might be memorials of the legendary meeting of two eagles at the centre spot of the earth³. All these, moreover, fall after the fourth century; and in the same period there is an owl dedicated by Phaedus on the Athenian Acropolis⁴, and a peacock dedicated by Hadrian to Argive Hera, “because the bird is held to be sacred to Hera⁵.” The dedication of the owl, so far from appearing a natural thing, seemed ludicrous, and the familiar proverb was applied to it with a difference, as though the man had sent coals to Newcastle. Thus we are not at liberty to interpret the ancient bronze owls found on the Acropolis as independent dedications, but as parts of statuettes or other objects⁶. The eagles and doves found in Olympia and Dodona were also not independently dedicated⁷. There were terra-cotta images of snakes found in the sanctuary of the Mistress in Arcadia; but their date is unknown, and their object is unknown. There were gold or silver snakes dedicated to Asclepius in Athens, but not before the fourth century: these were probably bangles, which went by the name of snake. A bronze peacock was found in the Heraeum; this too may have been part of another object, or if not, why should it not be a toy or ornament equally with the porcelain monkey and the porcelain cat? A few doves, one pair billing together, were found by the shrine of Aphrodite at Daphni and in Cyprus: if they were votive offerings, what was their date? and were they dedicated perhaps as a model of sacrifice, or as an allegory of human love? Crows are found in the shrine of Athena at Athens; but we hear nothing of their being sacred to her there or elsewhere. Aphrodite stands in Elis with her foot on a tortoise, “a hint to wives,” says Plutarch, “that they should stay at home and hold their tongues”; but more prosaic souls will remember that the tortoise was a common form of footstool. Lais was killed, it is said, by jealous Thessalian women, who beat her to death with “wooden tortoises” in the temple of Aphrodite. I do not know how it is to be proved that these were models dedicated to the goddess for mystical reasons, and not rather footstools caught up or brought from home as a ready weapon.

The facts may be summed up thus. There is no series of attendant animals dedicated to a deity on which an argument can be based. A few sporadic examples of these animals are found; but such animals dedicated to one deity generally are dedicated to one or more others. Those which can be shown to imply the idea that a deity preferred his attendant animal as a votive offering, are all too late to be brought in evidence\(^1\); those of which this cannot be shown are better explained on other and simpler principles. The doubtful ones cannot be proved to have been dedicated independently, and most of them are clearly parts of something else. Some few, apparently old and genuine, remain unexplained, such as the crows and the owl of Athens which stand on independent bases\(^2\). I will grant these to the symbolists; to build up a reversed Chinese pagoda, on a point supported by three crows and one obscure bird of night.

(1) The only divine attribute which is really distinctive is the thunderbolt, and this would make a pretty object for dedication; in fact objects of the same shape as the bolt of Zeus are now made and used as charms in India under the name of Indra's thunderbolts\(^3\). But the thunderbolt is never dedicated to Zeus or anybody else, neither has one been found in any of his shrines except in the hand of a figure. The symbolic argument fails utterly, then, just where it should be strongest, and gives presumptive evidence against the symbolic theory elsewhere.

(2) Arms and armour are the attributes of Aphrodite, Athena, Apollo, Artemis, the Dioscuri. They are constantly dedicated, and not to these deities only\(^4\) but to Zeus who does not wear them. The distinctive mark of Athena, the aegis, is not dedicated to any; nor are the hats of Hermes and the Dioscuri. Clothes and shoes are dedicated, not to these deities, but to Artemis and Asclepius, to Athena, Apollo, and Poseidon\(^5\). Corn, or its model, is dedicated not only to Demeter but to Apollo, Athena, Artemis\(^6\); grapes not to Dionysus only, but to Athena, Apollo, and Amphiaraus\(^7\), to Pan and Cabirus\(^8\). Skins of beasts are offered to Artemis, Pan, and the Nymphs\(^1\) as well as to Heracles and Dionysus. Torches are offered not to Hecate but to Athena\(^2\). No lyre is dedicated to Apollo, who bears it, but it is dedicated to Athena, who does not\(^3\). Tridents are offered to Poseidon, the thyrsus to Dionysus and to no one else: but why? This brings us to the third point.

(3) The reasons given for dedication are never symbolic\(^4\). The arms and armour are spoils of war or weapons used in war; clothes and shoes are firstfruits of work, thank-offerings for healing, or meant to dress the god's image. Corn and grapes are the firstfruit or tithe. Skins of beasts are the hunter's firstfruit, the fawnskin and thyrsus\(^5\) are the ceremonial dress dedication in memory of the orgy. Torches are a prize or a used tool, tridents the fisherman's spears which have been used, or are now past use. The lyre is a gift from Lesbos, where such things were made\(^6\).

In and after the fourth century, I still find no thunderbolts and no caduceus; but Antiochus, it is said, "dedicated" a gold aegis with a gorgoneum upon it, above the theatre in Athens\(^7\); as little a true dedication as an honorific statue set up in the agora.

I think I have proved that there is no case for the dedication of attributes or attendant animals to a deity for the reason that they were his attributes or attendant animals. What originally suggested the mistaken idea was a difference in feeling which has grown up between then and now, and especially the reverence of Christendom for the Cross. It follows that the object dedicated, such as a wolf, cock, or torch, cannot be made a criterion for deciding to what deity it was offered\(^8\).

Two articles need further consideration, because a symbolic or hierarchical meaning has been attached to both: the tripod, which is supposed to have special reference to Apollo; and the double-headed axe, which has been similarly associated with Zeus.

In Homeric days tripods and kettles formed no small part of human wealth; they were given as prizes and gifts, and they are spoken of in numbers just as one might speak of so many ounces of gold. They were dedicated in hosts at the great shrines, where they were one of the most notable sights. At Dodona the old ones appear to have been so many, that piled in heaps they formed a wall. Quantities of fragments have been found at the Heraeum, at Athens, Delos, Delphi, and Dodona. It appears, indeed, that like other material wealth, these had a certain fixed value, and past current like coins from hand to hand. Tripod and kettle are the names of units of currency in Crete; whether these were coins with that device on them or not, they can only be explained by supposing that the real things had once been such units. This will account for the common use of the tripod as a prize; originally given for what it was worth, it became a thing of tradition. The ancient symbolists gave the tripod a mystical meaning, (for example) that the three legs symbolized past, present, and future; and they associated it with Apollo because of his prophetic truth, with Dionysus because there is truth in the wine-cup. The greeks, perhaps without going so far, have yet sometimes seen a special appropriateness in the gift of a tripod to these two gods. But the tripod has no special connexion with either. It is dedicated not only to Dionysus as a musical prize; not only to Apollo in the shrines of Amyclae, Delphi, and Delos, Apollo Isemenian and Apollo Ptoan: but to Zeus at Dodona, Olympia, and Ithome, to Hera in Argos, to Athena at Athens, to the Graces and Muses, to Heracles at Thebes, in the Hierothysium at Messene, and in the Idaean cave of Crete.

The double-headed axe also appears to have had a fixt value in early days, and to have been a unit of currency; as it once was in America, and still is amongst backward races of men in Africa. The people of Tenedos send axes to Delphi as a thank-offering for what appears to have been a large catch of crabs. A Greek butcher in Italy offers an axe as tithe of his profits. Silver bowl and axe of price were a gift from Timasion to Seuthes. As the tripod, so also the axe forms a coin-device in Crete, Tenedos, and Pherei; and the "silver axe" is a coin in Cyprus. These indications throw light on the store of axes in the palace of Odysseus, which were doubtless part of his wealth; and on the axe as a prize in games. But the axe has no special connexion with Zeus: it is found not only at Dodona, Olympia, and in Crete, but is dedicated to Apollo in Delphi and elsewhere, and to Artemis in Arcadia. It is also seen in the hands of Dionysus, the Amazons, local heroes of Asia Minor; and Apollo in the same region; on a relief from Melos it is used to slay the Calydonian Boar; Ino attempts to kill Phrixus with it; Theseus fights with it. Double axes with marks of use on them have been found in a carpenter’s shop at Anthedon. There is nothing holy about this kind of axe, and if Zeus carries one at Labranda, he does so because it is a weapon; he stands for the protector of the city as Athena is with her spear and shield. There is therefore no recondite or symbolical meaning in the dedication of axes to Zeus or anybody else: indeed, where the reason is stated, they are either a tithe or spoil of war.

But there is another point to discuss. Both tripods and axes are made in miniature. At Olympia hundreds of tiny tripods were found; some carefully cast models, others merely cut out of foil, the object being indicated in the rudest way: many of which would be of no conceivable value to god or man. All the axes found in the Dictaean cave of Crete are unfit for use, the largest being too thin, and the smaller mere simulacra. The small ones are of different the meaning of these things be? There is no evidence for the dedication of toys, or indeed for their existence, thus early; and the tombs were not the tombs of children, but of kings, warriors, full-grown men. It has been already pointed out, that there is evidence for the axe as a unit of currency; and where large axes still circulate, small ones in bundles of ten, each representing a fraction of the axe-unit, are used for exchange. Little axes have also been found in Mexico, which are said by the Indians to have been used as money. This must explain our axelets; and the hole in the handle will have been meant to string them like Chinese cash. Whether the dots had any relation to the value there are too few examples to decide. Here I may mention, that Homer recognises the fractional half-axe.

But while the large axes could be used, the small ones were of no use; they were in fact tokens, half-way between the implement and the coin. It may be suggested that the small tripods and kettles of Olympia were also tokens, having no value, but representing a fraction of the full-size article in exchange. It may be that this is true only of the better specimens, those cut out of thin foil being simulacra, dedicated because the tripod was a traditional form of dedication. That the idea of dedicating simulacra was not unknown we see from the story which tells of wooden and clay tripods dedicated at Ithome.

Once the key is found, it may open more than one lock. We have already seen that iron bars were dedicated as a tithe, and that bars of iron are recorded in the Delian shrine. The late excavations at Argos have revealed a vast number of these bars; and it is suggested that large objects of iron the size of a mountain gun may have been the largest multiple of the bar currency, perhaps the very ones dedicated by Pheidon himself. There are also a large number of objects hitherto unexplained, which perhaps may be brought under the same category. These are the rings of Argos, Olympia, and other places, lances and arrowheads of thin foil from Delos, the miniature swords or knives, and helmet of Olympia, the miniature shields of Olympia and Crete, the miniature cuirasses of Praesus in Crete, the miniature wheels of Argos, Dodona, Lusi and Olympia.

Now Phanias speaks of bronze knives along with tripods and kettles as part of the wealth of Sicilian shrines, just as bars are mentioned as part of the wealth of Delphi by Epicharmus. Shields in full size, and in miniature as fractions of the same shape as the larger, are used in South America for exchange. There is evidence that shields were once so used in Greece. Many of the small ones found are indistinguishable from the heads of large pins or buttons; but in view of the facts given above we need not fear to call them shields. Any article under the sun, used in exchange, might be modelled as a token; as we see from the researches of Ridgeway and Temple. I may here call attention to the ancient coinage of China, which imitates in metal a ring or a knife, a bale of cloth, a spade or hoe, or a wheel. So also we find shields in the South Pacific and in North America used as currency; and models of axes, spear-heads, hoes, millstones, even a conventionalised frying-pan, are found in different parts of Africa, Asia, or America. If this explanation be right, the wheels of Olympia may have nothing to do with chariots or chariot-races; and perhaps even the chariots themselves may often be simulacra given instead of the real thing. The Greeks were on the same path as the Chinese took; but they did not follow it out to its logical conclusion, and offer paper money to the shades.

Two other classes of dedications demand a brief word: the dedication of one god in the temple of another, and the dedication of grotesques or genre figures.

The figure of a god might be dedicated in any temple as an ornament to the temple, choice spoil of war, and the like; of which we have seen examples in the old statue from Tiryns at Argos, the Hermes of Praxiteles and Aphrodite which stood in the Heraeum at Olympia, and probably the figure of Apollo dedicated as a tithe to Athena. So Theseus dedicates at Delphi an image of Aphrodite which had belonged to Ariadne.

9 This principle is correctly laid down by Letronne, Sur l'usage des anciens de consacrer la statue d'un dieu à un autre dieu; Rev. Arch. i. 439 ff. Lettre à M. Millingen, Annali vi. 198 ff. CIG 3159 says as much, late as it is: Κοινώνος Βαλέριος 'Ουλιανός Συμφραίος 'Ασκληπιών ἱπτήρι Δίως Σωτήρος ἀγαλμα σῶν βάσει ἀργυρῇ γύψου μεστῇ ἀνέθηκεν, but he seems to feel some appropriateness in selecting Zeus Soter. The figure that Letronne calls Apollo, which is dedicated to Asclepius, is more probably a worshipper in ritual act.

Others are less clear. Hermes was said to have been dedicated by Cecrops in the temple of Athena Polias, where he stood. The Eleans dedicated an Athena at Olympia. Micythus dedicated Amphitrite, Poseidon, and Hestia in the same place. Besides these Pausanias mentions Artemis in a temple of Demeter, Aphrodite and Athena in a temple of Zeus, Apollo, the Muses, and Heracles in a temple of Asclepius, Artemis Leucophryene dedicated by the sons of Themistocles on the Acropolis at Athens, Enyo, two statues of Aphrodite, with Heracles and Apollo, in a temple of Ares. With what thought these were dedicated there is no saying. If such figures are part of a group, then the dedication is easily understood, and falls under one of the great principles we have seen working everywhere. Perhaps they were all dedicated as ἀγάλματα.

But I can find no authority for the dedication of one deity as a deity to another until very late times; when it is exemplified by a dedication of Artemis to Apollo, of Heracles to Asclepius, of Aphrodite to Asclepius, of Athena to Artemis or Asclepius, of Hermes to Pan and the Nymphs. These are an extension of the vicious idea which brought honorific statues into the temples. There were of course altars of other deities in a divine precinct, as at Athens, Olympia, Epidaurus, and there seems to be no reason why a dedication should not be made at those altars to those deities:

but this is different. There are no figures demonstrable for other gods, and not part of an ornament or group, amongst the Acropolis remains, at Dodona, or in the part of Olympia which belonged specially to Zeus. On the other hand, in the Cabirium came to light twenty-five Pans, one inscribed to the son of the Cabirus\(^1\); at Elatea, in the shrine of Athena, were twenty-two figures of other gods, Eros, Psyche, Leda, Dionysus, Aphrodite, Demeter; in the shrines of Amynus were some ancient seated goddesses\(^2\). With the exception of the last, which may have got there by accident\(^3\), all these are probably given as pretty things which had some value for the givers; the dedication of Pan to the Cabirus’ little boy looks like a sympathetic thought. This will also explain the Silenus figures and grotesques, which meet us in shoals\(^4\).

In taking a last look backwards it is impossible not to feel with a new force how little there is in early times of the specialization of functions. The local deity or hero was lookt to for help in all emergencies, and all sorts of offerings might be paid to him. Panofka\(^5\) has written an elaborate study to prove that the dedicator chose his deity for some supposed connexion, based largely on names, that is by his hypothesis on the family worship: a man named Diodorus preferring Zeus, Apollonius Apollo, and so forth. The reader will search in vain in this book for evidence to support that ingenious theory; neither will he find it necessary to call in mythical kinship to explain the dedication of a statue of Athena to Apollo. And as our study has shown what variety of blessing one deity could dispense, so it shows the infinite variety of objects which could be dedicated for one cause. Every kind of prayer can be addressed to Athena, Apollo, Poseidon, or Zeus; almost every kind of object is given to Asclepius for one and the same boon.
